THE CONQUEST OF MOUNT MCKINLEY: The Story of Three Expeditions through the Alaskan Wilderness to Mount McKinley, North America's Highest and Most Inaccessible Mountain, by Belmore Browne, with an appendix by Herschel C. Parker. Seven years ago Mr. Browne, seated in the smoking car of a Canadian Pacific railway coach, quite casually discovered a man sitting across from him who disclosed that he was planning to scale Mount McKinley. The man turned out to be Professor Herschel Parker, and before the day was over Mr. Browne had decided to join forces with him. This first expedition was in 1906, and Dr. Cook (who was already well known as an Arctic explorer and who had a considerable sum of money from a wealthy eastern sportsman) was also of the party. It was unsuccessful and in 1910 Mr. Browne and Professor Parker were preparing for another ascent when they heard that Dr. Cook had publicly announced his achievement of the climb. They had proof of its falsity when the doctor's book appeared, but were subjected to the most abusive letters from all parts of the country that they should dare to doubt his honesty. The climb was not accomplished until 1912, and this very readable book is a detailed record of it. Mount McKinley is 20,300 feet above the sea, and the climbing was done with incredible dangers and difficulties. The book's value is unquestionable and the photographs and charts are of special merit. [G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York. $3.50 net.

ROMANTIC AMERICA, by Robert Haven Schauffler. Our fascinating land seems to be receiving more than her usual share of attention this year. Mr. Schauffler, poet, musician, sculptor, athlete, editor and writer of delightful essays and articles in many fields, attempts to interpret the romantic beauties of the United States in such a way that our globe trotters will be less supercilious about them. He succeeds admirably and nowhere do we remember to have seen such a collection of magnificent full page etchings or colored plates by celebrated artists. The names include Maxfield Parrish, George Inness, Jr., Joseph Pennell, Winslow Homer, Albert Herter, Andre Castaigne, Earl Horter, Harry Fenn and others. This is a gorgeous holiday offering far too beautiful to sell so cheaply. [Century Company, New York. $5.

AMERICA AS I SAW IT, by Mrs. Alec-Tweedie, is one of the most refreshingly informal, provocative and readable descriptions of American life ever written. Its English author calls it a "cubist impression picture of a great country" and confesses to a great love of "America, her women, her oysters, her grape fruit, her rivers, her roses, her express elevators, her quaint ways, her eager life, her kindness to the stranger within her gates, and her serene satisfaction with all and everything American." She criticises with utter frankness, and her humor is apparent even in chapter headings—for instance: "Where Are the Men? (Cultured Chicago)"; "Land of Assimilation (Amusements)"; "The Other America (Boston)"; "Christmas and Edison." Our great sin, according to Mrs. Tweedie, is hypersensitiveness. There are numerous etchings by Joseph Pennell. Altogether the sprightliest volume of the year. [Macmillan Company, New York. $3 net.

Barn Doors and Byways, by Walter Prichard Eaton. The title has all of Mr. Eaton's enchanting whimsicality in it; the text has all that and more besides, for it's the work of a man of wide cultivation, delightful acquaintance with books and men, and a very distinctive sense of word values, and the two-tone brown prints by Walter King Stone are lovely enough to frame. This New York critic and busy author has never lost his organic affinity for nature in the open places and in these essays he offers a memory of "barn-door landscapes" that have the real feel of the woods in them. An ideal book to give to other men in Mr. Eaton's predicament. Charmingly bound and printed. [Small, Maynard and Company, Boston. $2.50 net.

Two on a Tour of South America, by Anna Wentworth Sears. An interesting and most refreshing account of the experiences of a New York woman and her husband in South America. Mrs. Sears possesses that spirit of adventure indispensable to the good traveler which makes her delight in new experiences, recognizing discomfort and inconvenience as pleasure's toll. Designed to entertain rather than instruct, her book will especially appeal to the general reader, who will delight in the intimacy of its personal element. It is engagingly written, with many interesting bits of information and bright flashes of humor, but never an unjust criticism or disparaging comparison. Sailing from New York, the first stop was at Kingston in "the garden isle of Jamaica," where they reveled in January's tropical luxuriance. From there they went to Panama with "its unhealthy, vivid greens and brilliant, feverish blooms"; then down the west coast with a day at Guayaquil, "the worst fever port in the universe," and thence to Lima, rich in relics of Pizarro. There were interesting days at Valparaiso and Santiago, where the street car conductors were all women, and then they crossed the Andes to the east coast. A facile pen, keen perception and a rare appreciation of the beauties of nature make the book of interest to stay-at-home travelers.

The Carolina Mountains, by Margaret W. Morley. Miss Morley lives in the heart of the Carolinas a large part of every year, and the study of the region offered in this book is intimate enough to serve guidebook purposes. Discovery and Conquest of Costa Rica, by R. Fernandez Guardia; translated by H. W. Van Dyke. There is a special timeliness in the publication of the history of this progressive little republic because of the worldwide interest now directed toward the Isthmus of Panama and Central America generally. It is not only an authentic and scholarly account of the progress and development of Costa Rica, but it relates the early history of that entire region. The author, a native Costa Rican, is especially qualified to produce this work by reason of his long connection with public affairs and his intimate knowledge of all matters of national import. His material has been largely gathered from the archives of the Indies at Seville, a veritable treasure house to the American historian. Especial value attaches to the chronicles of the conquistadores, many of whom, through ignorance, have too long been unjustly charged with cruelty and spoliation. The book is profusely illustrated with maps and photographs and will readily be recognized as a valuable acquisition to every historical library. [Thomas Y. Crowell Company, New York. $3.

The Old Franciscan Missions of California, by George Wharton James, will especially appeal to those who have visited or contemplate visiting the old missions. In these beautiful old buildings, rich in memories of an age now passed, centers all that is picturesque or romantic in California. Mr. James not only gives the important facts connected with their founding, but describes their architecture and relates the legends woven about them and the padres who, we must admit—regardless of religious convictions—were often splendid examples of generous, fearless and self-sacrificing manhood. A Woman Rice Planter, by Patience Pennington. A South Carolina gentlewoman assumes entire management of two large rice plantations on the shores of her native state—with what successes and failures she tells in her diary, now published as a book. Besides being a most interesting and intimate story of unique experience, this book is destined to become a history of a fast-vanishing day, for the plantation life of the "old South" has become virtually a thing of the past. Rural Life in Canada, by John McDougall. Recent agitation has acquainted us with the depletion of our rural population, but we had not known the equally serious extent of that movement in Canada. This volume by the Presbyterian pastor at Spencerville, Ontario, shows that the situation there is largely typical of conditions throughout the country. In one country school forty years ago there were forty-five pupils on the roll; there are only three now. Spencerville is a village of 200 people with seven deserted farms on one side alone. Seventy-six young people left one small church in seven years for other places. Mr. McDougall points out the economic and social causes and solutions, and then turns to the service of the church in the whole situation. He lays out a feasible country church program. The Heart of Gaspe, by John Mason Clarke. A charming book about an old section which most readers would not easily find on the map. Dr. Clarke is the well-known New York geologist and has roamed about this bit of seacoast in the province of Quebec for years. Gaspe is that vast peninsula of eastern Quebec which looks across the Gulf of St. Lawrence towards Newfoundland, and lies just south of the mouth of the St. Lawrence river. It is larger than the state of Massachusetts. Dr. Clarke writes of it with all the enthusiasm of a geologist and artist and humanitarian in a book that makes a delightful incentive to a visit. The British Isles

SHAKESPEARE AND STRATFORD, by Henry C. Shelley. It is related that P. T. Barnum was very eager to buy that Henley street home of John Shakespeare which may or may not have been the birthplace of his son William. It has even been related that he did buy it, remove it to America and substitute in Stratford a facsimile of the original. The effectual denial of this yarn, as Mr. Shelley points out, is in the fact that Barnum never made any attempt to "show" the birthplace in this country. He was not the man to hide a birthplace under a bushel. Stratford has about 8,000 inhabitants, and its sole industry is—Shakespeare. About 40,000 pilgrims with pocketfuls of sixpence visit the shrines of Stratford every year. Mr. Shelley writes for that small minority who care to disentangle the probable truth from the "Barnum bunk" prevalent in Stratford. He gives a delightful resume of his extensive study in this most readable and informing book which no pilgrim to Stratford should neglect to read. Mr. Shelley is jocund but reverent, scholarly but companionable, discriminating but not discouraging to hero worship. His book is a real contribution to letters and should become a classic for Shakespearean pilgrims. The illustrations from photographs by Mr. Shelley are excellent. FAMILIAR SPANISH TRAVELS, by William Dean Howells. Both in authorship and style this book is noteworthy. In his poetic "argument" Mr. Howells explains that he has tried to put forth "the joy of Spanish things" which struck its roots deep in his boyish heart. But his youthful yearning to visit what he considered the land of romance was not gratified until he was 74 years old. Of course he was disappointed, but at the same time his impressions are marvelously fresh and entertaining. The personal, autobiographical and imaginative touches are the most interesting part of the book, but Mr. Howells does not neglect to give us some vivid pictures of modern Spain—which is something altogether different from the ancient land of Don Quixote. He sees Spain with a kindly and ever youthful heart as he travels southward from San Sebastian through Castile, Valladolid, Madrid —"least Spanish but most national" —Toledo, "sole in her beauty," Cordova, Seville, the "incomparable," to Granada, ending at Algeciras and Tarifa—"the quaintest town left in the world." There are a large number of adequate halftone illustrations and the book has been finely bound. It will be one of the season's satisfying gift offerings. [Harper and Brothers, New York. $2 net.

PARIS NIGHTS and Other Impressions of Places and People, by Arnold Bennett. For the reader who likes to be taken by the elbow and piloted to the opera, the theater, the cafes, through crowds, cities, famous forests and gardens, over mountains, rivers and railroads, all to the accompaniment of the most vividly brilliant talk, Mr. Bennett's new book will be ideal. He begins with Paris, goes to London, reverts to Italy, the Riviera, Fontainebleau, Switzerland and then back to England again; and the sketches of these places are even more informally entertaining than those published last year about the United States. Mr. Bennett may have his limitations, but certainly he's without a peer in writing this type of travel book. When the arrangements were being made for the illustrations he said, "If I can't get Rickards to illustrate my book I want nobody"; so E. A. Rickards has made an infinitude of clever sketches, all of which have been mounted on tinted paper most attractively. Since Mr. Dreiser's Europan impressions are not to be published till after Christmas, this book has the field all to itself. There's nothing else in any way like it. [George H. TWENTY CENTURIES OF PARIS, by Mabell S. C. Smith, is among the best of the many books about Paris. It has less charm than Mr. Lucas's "Wanderer in Paris," but more continuity; less information about dwellings than is to be found in Hare and other writers who deal with historic houses of Paris, but more information about the evolution of the city, the spreading of its population, the development of its architecture, and the setting of the great scenes from that stupendous drama which is its history. Mrs. Smith knows her Paris and she knows French history. She helps us to review, as in a procession, the twenty centuries of Paris under the Gauls and the Romans, the Merovingians and Carlovingians, the houses of Capet and Valois and Bourbon, and under the eight different regimes of the last hundred years. It's precisely the book that visitors to Paris most ardently wish for—a history of the bewitching city with special relation to the present remains of its earlier days. There are many interesting illustrations and helpful maps. [Thomas Y. Crowell Company, New York. $2 net.

The Spell of Switzerland, by Nathan Haskell Dole. A book of tremendous interest deliberately cast in the guise of fiction and made desultory rather than solidly academic. There's not a perfunctory page in it, and it might serve as a model to many a more pretentious effort that fails of stimulation because of a dry tone of scholarship. Mr. Dole is a scholar, but he knows how to be an entertaining one. Chillon, Geneva, Lake Leman, Lake Constance, Lake Lucerne, Chamonix, Zurich, Lausanne, Mont Blanc, the Matterhorn, are all dealt with charmingly, and such personages as Gibbon, Rousseau, Byron, Tissot, Hannibal and many others flit vividly through the pages. The photographs and paintings by Waldemar Ritter are highly effective and the book falls very readily into the class of elaborate gift books for which this publishing house is noted. [L. C. Royal Castles of England, by Henry C. Shelley. This author is so prolific (there are at least three notable books published by him this season) that one is constantly amazed at the continuing excellence of his work. But Mr. Shelley has a standard and he never lets himself fall below it. In his own words, this book is "an account of those ancient piles which were either the homes of English sovereigns or were intimately associated with the romances or tragedies of their lives, and of their immediate surroundings which are so closely connected with the stories of the buildings themselves." The whole thing is so rich in impressions it leaves one with the feeling of having reread "Ivanhoe" or something of that sort. The illustrations are from rare old prints and new photographs. [L. C. Athens the Violet-Crowned, by Lilian Whiting, has for its raison d'etre the presentment of present-day conditions in the city which was once the center of the world's civilization. Poland of Today and Yesterday: A Review of Its History, Past and Present, and of the Causes which Resulted in Its Partition, Together with a Survey of Its Social, Political and Economic Conditions Today, by Nevin O. Winter. There's an interesting paragraph in Mr. Winter's preface. He says that to those sentimentalists who believe individual freedom to be of more importance than the welfare of organized society he recommends a study of Poland and the causes of her downfall. But in the next breath he confesses that only the nobles—one-twentieth of the population—had attained what might be called real individualism. All this causes one to open the book with zest. The Poles are worth studying; they have given the world some of its greatest scientists and artists, and Mr. Winter writes from this point of view. There are many fine photographs. [L. C. Africa, the Orient, the Holy Land

The Man of Egypt, by Clayton Sedgwick Cooper. This is the most exhaustive and vital study of present-day Egypt and its people so far published. Mr. Cooper regards the Egyptian as the coming man; a glorious future may be prophesied for him, based upon the present indications of a new industrial order, the rise of the national spirit, the new attitude of the fellaheen (farmers), the new schools and the "will and desire of the men of Egypt." There are comprehensive chapters on the government, missionary schools, vocational training, the Moslem and the Copt, Islam and modernity, and two of special value on Egypt's new pharaoh (Lord Kitchener) and "What Is an Egyptian Mohammedan?" The author has had the cooperation of highest authorities, Lord Kitchener himself taking a personal interest in the investigations. African Camp Fires, by Stewart Edward White, follows his "In the Land of Footprints," both being tales of African life, travel and adventure. The newer book gives the author's experiences in the low, hot, wooded country along the coast known as the Shimba Hills in quest of that rare beast, the sable antelope, telling also of various other hunting expeditions and their excitements and trophies. Mr. White has been trained by life in the open to see things and by long experience as a writer to tell without superfluities what he sees. With the Russian Pilgrims to Jerusalem, by Stephen Graham, is a book of intensely human interest. Mr. Graham says what many travelers feel: "Jerusalem is a place of disillusion for the tourist who would like to feel himself a pilgrim." On the other hand he finds a veritable new Jerusalem when it is seen through truly pilgrim eyes. He set out from the harbor at Constantinople on a pilgrim boat with 560 Russian peasants bound for Jaffa. Immediately he was taken into their confidence and accepted all their experiences with them. The sincerity and deep earnestness of the pilgrims are coupled with continuous humor, and at the same time the religious purpose is never lost. [Macmillan Company, New York. $2.75 net.

Three Quarterlies

THE HIBBERT JOURNAL for October contains an unusually varied and interesting group of articles. The first of these is by Theodore Roosevelt on the Progressive party, which is pictured as an organization working for the righting of "the injustices of the present social system," and its principles and plans are given from the ethical point of view. Sir Francis Younghusband, the well-known English military leader who penetrated into the heart of Tibet, contributes an article on "Some Laymen's Needs." He realizes the eternal demand for religion in human nature, but believes that even the New Testament has come to be outgrown as a source of religious belief —a conclusion which, we cannot help thinking, he reaches only by a superficial and unhistorical exegesis. Sir Frederick Pollock writes on "The Relation of Mystic Experience to Philosophy," Professor Pringle-Pattison on "The Free Man's Worship," Lord Ernest Hamilton on "Immortality and Competition," Charles E. Ozanne on "Non-Evidential Material in Psychical Research," Cecil Reddie on "The Public Schools and the Empire," F. W. Leith-Ross on "International Morality," E. H. Jones on "The Evolution of the Social Conscience Toward Crime and Industrialism," Professor H. H. Wendt of Jena on "The Historical Trustworthiness of the Book of Acts," Rev. G. W. THE CONSTRUCTIVE QUARTERLY for September sounds a clear call in behalf of unity to the various branches of Christendom. The first article is by the Archbishop Platon of the Greek Church of North America and its title adequately describes its object. It reads: "Admitting All Impossibilities, Nevertheless Unity Possible." This is followed by "An Appeal for Unity from Italy," by Mgr. Bonomelli. Next come some distinctively American voices —F. D. Kershner, George P. Mains and Thomas J. Garland—supporting the exhortation of the two preceding contributors. Principal Forsyth's discussion of "Congregationalism and Liberty," Bishop Hall's "The Anglican Position Constructively Stated" and Robert E. Speer's "Foreign Missions: A Constructive Interpretation of Christian Principles" move along the same line, though somewhat indirectly. Other articles are by A. T. Fraser on "Missionary Education in India," by Excellenz von Bezzell on "Church and State," by Max Turrmann on "Moral and Religious Restoration in Tenement House Quarters in Paris," by George B. Eager on "Christ's Teaching About Marriage," and by Jacques Geiller on "Frederick Ozanam, the Founder of the Conferences of Saint Vincent de Paul." [George H. Doran Company, New York. 75 cents.

The Open Hearth

No "Dead Line" for Dr. Stoddard

In the sixty-one years of continuous and successful pastoral service of Dr. Elijah Woodward Stoddard, beginning in his thirty-second year and running on into his ninety-fourth year, and in his unique influence to the very last over the people he served, some of the current opinions as to the Christian ministry meet a notable exception, if not a flat contradiction.

It cannot be said in his case that the "dead line" of the ministry comes in middle life, that the modern preacher has lost his hold upon the people, nor that the country church is a failure. Having passed the fifty-year mark long ago, he pressed on and up past the threescore years and ten and the fourscore years of the psalmist's ideal and away beyond even fourscore years and ten. For him there seemed to be no "dead line" anywhere in sight. Within less than three weeks from the end, which came on Oct. 30, he took part in the Sunday services of his church. With some assistance he had continued to preach until within a few short months of that date, and he kept up the pastoral care and oversight to the very last.

The hundreds of people streaming in from all directions to the quiet village of Succasunna, N. J., on Sunday morning, Nov. 2, to attend his funeral service in the Presbyterian church, where he had preached for well nigh fifty years, bore witness to the power of his personality and the success of his life work, as well as to the affection and esteem in which he was held. Two or three hundred of these visitors could not get inside the church. Churches of other denominations closed their doors to come to the service.

While Dr. Stoddard was of far more than ordinary ability as a thinker and a preacher, his great hold upon his people lay in his unselfish devotion to their welfare and his purity of spirit and purpose. He won their hearts through loving service and genuine sympathy and compassion. His attitude in theology, personal life and pastoral service was ever optimistic, cheery and inspirational. Now that he is gone, a whole community is in sorrow that they "shall see his face no more."

never thought of blaming "the neighbors" for not looking her up—those widely scattered comrades who, each according to his strength, was meeting problems of his own. Her nearest neighbor was a young bachelor, five miles away, who worked in town most of the time. Other shacks were being built, but as yet the nearest ones were empty. She remembered what she had said to Joe about a gun. She now read the word "neighbor" for "gun." "Neighbors are for folks who do not know God," and then smiled at her foolishness.

Monday of Thanksgiving week. In the night, in the lulls of the storm, she heard cattle bellowing and lowing close at hand. In the morning there were seven steers stalled in breast-high snow. What if they should bear the fence down and break the windows or push in the door? She had heard of a school teacher's shack into which a herd of storm-stampeded cattle had broken, wrecking the little abode.

All day Tuesday and all night the storm raged. The cattle still bunched and bawled beside the fence. It was weary hours since she had slept, for the fire must be kept carefully. She brooded her darling in the warmth of her own body. Wednesday at dawn she stared out of the frosted windows at a low-

Under mother's watchful eye, the turkey will be done to a turn and all other good things will appear in due time, some of them piping hot, and others deliciously cold. Mother is too good a cook to forget the seasoning—pepper and salt and maybe sage. Better than such condiments is the laughter of love; the merriment of children and the enthusiasm of youth. Best of all is the presence, if they have been spared, of grandfather and grandmother, with their heart-glow of memory and hope.

The Presbyterian family of faith has a Thanksgiving table laden with bounty. Nature has prepared her a sumptuous feast this year. Will she forget to season it with Christlike love as she remembers the aged fathers and mothers in Israel? Their need unprovided for will make her feast bitter. Their wants supplied will add the flavor to her earthly repast.

Season your Thanksgiving dinner, O Church, with the grateful prayers of the aged and disabled servants of God.

hanging sky and air filled with flying snow. It looked as if the storm was the end of all. Out of such a wide, wide sky of greyness no sun could ever shine again! But the watcher shook herself peremptorily out of such unfaith. There was just an armful of fuel left. She would plan for the finish of the siege.

She filled the stove and thoroughly warmed her shaking body. She heated flatirons and several bricks, wrapped them carefully and made a little nest among them in the bed for the child. She wrapped her bread with a cloth and put it with a can of condensed milk inside the bed where the warmth of her feet would keep it from freezing. She had been forgetting to eat, but she now forced herself to drink a can of the milk, heated and very sweet. She wound the clock and unlocked the door.

"What else can I do?" she asked herself, looking about the room as if bidding it good-by. "Well, when we wake I can chop up the chairs and table—anything—till Joe comes home."

She softly hushed the child to sleep, laid it in the warm nest she had made and then lay down beside it, curving her arm about the bright little head and baring her breast near the sweet mouth. For she was so exhausted with the lonely battle that she felt as if she might not awaken — perhaps not when Joe came home.

So there Joe's darlings slept in the heart of that great storm the day before the national day of "solemn feasting." If Maggie recalled her study of history at school, she might have heard an echo of that voice from England, speaking to the Pilgrim fathers almost 200 years before: "Let it not be grievous to you that you have been instrumental to break the ice for others. The honor shall be yours to the world's end." For it is a great thing to have a share in laying the foundations of a state. (To be concluded)

The Unexpected Dinner

[PRIZE WINNER]

"GOODNESS ME!" thought John Williams as he tramped wearily along. "Judging by the appearance of the sun, it must be nearly noon. Here I am miles away from camp, and no sign of life near."

It was a crisp November morning, the kind that makes a person feel like engaging in active work or play. Two weeks before John had come up to Maine with a party of campers. He had been having a fine time, but today, while following a likely looking deer trail, he became lost. Then a slide down a steep hillside had bruised him and broken his rifle. To cap the climax it was Thanksgiving day, and he almost groaned at the thought of the plump wild turkey cooked back at the camp.

"Co'bo'! Co'bo'!" a distant shout broke the stillness. John knew enough of farm life to know that "Co'bo'!" was used to call a cow. He felt sure that a cow meant a habitation, so he hastened in the direction from which the call came; and, presently, from a fringe of trees surrounding a small farm, he saw a welcome sight. It was the very farmhouse at which they had bought supplies on their way to camp. There was the hired man leading the cow behind the house. There was Mr. Davis, the owner, counting the chickens as they pecked at the corn he had just given them.

But what was that smell in the air? John took a sniff and hurried round to the kitchen door to ask Mrs. Davis if they could give him dinner, for it was roast turkey he smelled. Blending with it came the savory odor of plum pudding. And, greatly to his joy, he was invited to share it; so he settled himself for a good feast. It is enough to say he got it! A dinner for a king.

After the meal he and Mr. Davis's nephews, who were visiting him, sat before the roaring fire. They roasted chestnuts, played games, and told stories for a couple of hours.

At last John thought it time to start back to camp. He left his rifle to be fixed at the nearest town. Mr. Davis directed him to camp, and he went on his way rejoicing, carrying a big pumpkin pie and a bag of apples, and concluding that this Thanksgiving day had been "the best ever."

FAMILY OF FIVE

All Drank Coffee from Infancy

It is a common thing in this country to see whole families growing up with nervous systems wrecked by coffee drinking.

That is because many parents do not realize that coffee contains a drug—caffeine—which causes the trouble. (The same drug is found in tea.)

"There are five children in my family," writes an Iowa mother, "all of whom drank coffee from infancy up to two years ago.

"My husband and I had heart trouble and were advised to quit coffee. We did so and began to use Postum. We now are doing without medicine and are entirely relieved of heart trouble.

(Caffeine causes heart trouble when continually used as in coffee drinking.)

"Our 11-year-old boy had a weak digestion from birth, and yet always craved and was given coffee. When we changed to Postum he liked it and we gave him all he wanted. He has been restored to health by Postum and still likes it."

Name given by Postum Company, Battle Creek, Mich. Write for the little book, "The Road to Wellville."

Postum comes in two forms:

Regular Postum—must be boiled.

Instant Postum is a soluble powder. A teaspoonful dissolves quickly in a cup of hot water and, with cream and sugar, makes a delicious beverage instantly. Grocers sell both kinds.

"There's a reason" for Postum.

Thankful—for What?

[PRIZE WINNER]

MR. HARDEN surveyed the cheerless prospect about him for several minutes. The barn and house were as dismal as were his thoughts. So today was Thanksgiving day! Ah, well! What had he to be thankful for, anyway? Nothing!

A picture rose before his mind—one that was ever present. It was of a party in a carriage that was just leaving a big cheerful farmyard. In the rear seat sat Mrs. Harden and her 16-year-old daughter Ruth. The front seat was occupied by a jolly looking farmer, he, himself.

That was his family group one year ago today. He had driven them to the railroad station and had since heard only of the wreck of the train on which they left. To his frantic efforts to learn of them no answer had been received.

During the interval he had thought of them constantly. At last, yielding to despair, he became a lonely, embittered man.

As he stood feeding his chickens and musing thus he came to the conclusion that the cause of the happiness of the chickens was their lack of understanding. For who could be happy with even the leaves of the trees dead from grief!

A sharp rattle of carriage wheels recalled him to himself. Who could it be? He had not had a visitor for seven months. Could it be? He dared not hope! As he held his breath the door of the carriage was thrown open and out bounded—yes, it was they!

Without waiting for further thought, he dashed forward into their arms. By the merest fortune the chickens did not lose their necks, nor were they crushed in this wild rush.

After the hearty embrace came eager questioning. They had suffered injury from the wreck and had long been confined in a southern hospital. To their letters no replies had come. Later Mr. Harden found out that this was due to the change of postmasters in the village (the new one being very careless), and to the recent vote of the selectmen to change the name of the township from Plentyville to Brookside.

That afternoon as Mr. Harden fed his chickens he was assisted by Mrs. Harden and Ruth. No longer the world seemed gloomy nor the barn and house dismal. It could not be that the leaves were dead of grief! They had just disappeared for a time. It had truly been a Thanksgiving Day. What had he to be thankful for? Everything!

THE FIELD OF CHRISTIAN EFFORT

RECENT EVANGELISTIC ACTIVITIES

Nebraska—Rev. James Rayborn will begin evangelistic services at Thayer Nov. 23. A choral union has been conducting musical services preliminary to the meetings.

Iowa—Rev. G. Harrison Worden of Salina has closed a twenty-five days' campaign of evangelistic work with Olivet church, Sioux City. A big tent seating nearly 500 was used for the meetings.—Rev. L. E. Koenig is assisting Rev. D. W. Cassat in special meetings at Cedar in Iowa Presbytery.

Illinois—Evangelistic meetings were conducted in Mansfield church recently. The pastor, Rev. A. S. Covert, was assisted by an evangelistic singer, J. H. Sawtell of Burlington, Iowa.—Special services to continue two weeks were recently commenced at Fifth church, Springfield, Ill. Rev. A. B. Bergen is pastor.

New York—Methodists and Presbyterians recently joined in a campaign for four weeks at Goshen, N. Y. The preaching was done by M. V. B. Williams of Athens, Pa. The two churches are holding union Sunday evening services and the young people's societies have also joined. Rev. Francis S. Haines is pastor.

Pennsylvania—Rev. H. D. Sheldon of Auburn, N. Y., assisted by Rev. George Graff and W. H. Houghton as singer, has just cómpleted an evangelistic campaign in Montrose. A tabernacle seating 1,000 was used. The meetings were under the auspices of the Presbyterian, Methodist and Baptist churches and were well and heartily supported. Over 100 professed conversion and the churches were awakened.—The total number of conversions at Chambersburg, Pa., as a result of the union service conducted by Dr. W. E. Biederwolf was 1,100.

Ohio—The week of prayer for the Christian associations of Wooster University was observed Nov. 9-16. Dr. George G. Mahy, secretary of General Assembly's committee on evangelism, Dr. J. W. Cochran, secretary of the Board of Education, and Miss Henrica Mead of the student committee of the Woman's Mission Board were the leaders in these services. — An evangelistic conference of Wooster Presbytery was held in the First church, Wooster, Nov. 17. Dr. Mahy made addresses on "Pastoral Evangelism" and "Presbyterial Evangelism."

SCHOOL AND COLLEGE

New Field Agent—Dr. William A. Cook, Wheeling, W. Va., has been appointed field agent for Davis and Elkins College. He has been a member of the board of trustees for several years.

One-Fifth of Boys to Be Ministers—There are twenty-one students for the ministry in the freshman class in Wooster University. There are 100 boys and sixty-two girls in this class. The foreign mission volunteer band in the university has increased from eleven to thirty-one members since college opened in September.

Has Korean School—Hastings College has a Korean school this year in connection with the college. Six Korean lads who could speak no English came in this fall, several of them graduates of high schools in foreign lands. They have special teaching and the amount of work they can do and the command of the English language they have already attained is surprising.

Conservatory Is Dedicated—The new conservatory of music at James Millikin University erected by the trustees of the Millikin estate, at a cost of nearly $100,000, was dedicated Nov. 7. Addresses were delivered by President Fellows, Dr. W. H. Penhallegon, syndic, and Rev. C. E. Jenny. Dr. S. E. McClelland represented the Millikin estate in turning over the building to the trustees.

Auburn Asks Half a Million—The directors of Auburn Seminary have entered upon a campaign for half a million dollars for endowment and new buildings. A committee of William R. Taylor, D. D., Rochester, chairman; A. F. Schauffler, D. D., New York City; Edgar C. Leonard, Albany; Theodore H. Wickwire, Cortland, and George Underwood, Auburn, is formulating plans for an aggressive campaign.

Dedicate Museum—Thomas Arnold Greene Memorial Museum was dedicated at Milwaukee-Downer College on Oct. 31. President Ellen C. Sabin presided. Professor Rollin D. Salisbury of the University of Chicago gave the principal address. Miss Margaret Louise Campbell, curator of the museum, Dr. Nelson P. Hulst, trustee, and William W. Wight, president of the board of trustees, were among others who took part.

WILL TRY TO REACH TURKISH WOMEN

By the appointment of Miss Frances C. Gage to traveling work in the Turkish empire outside of Constantinople, and Miss Anna Welles to special work in Constantinople, the foreign department of the Y. W. C. A. is undertaking work in a new field. In September, 1913, Miss Jane Shaw Ward and Miss Theresa Severin sailed from San Francisco for association work in China, and Miss Margery Melcher sailed from Boston for work in India. In October Miss Persis M. Breed left New York for association work in Buenos Aires.—The Wellesley College association has recently pledged $500 additional toward the work of the Y. W. C. A. in Peking, China.—A few city associations have expressed the hope that during the coming year they may support their own representative on the foreign field.—An unusually large number of Oriental women students are in New York City this winter —eighteen in all—Chinese, Japanese and Indian.

DR. BOYLE WILL GO TO DETROIT JAN. 1

Dr. W. H. Wray Boyle of Lake Forest, Ill., will go to Detroit Jan. 1 as pastor of Woodward Avenue church. He has been at Lake Forest ten years, following a successful pastorate at House of Hope church, St. Paul, Minn. Lake Forest church during his pastorate has doubled its contributions to missions. A chapel has been built for the Sunday school and the young men's club is about to build a community house. Dr. Boyle has been a member of the Church Extension Board of Chicago and has been closely related to Lake Forest College. He is now compiling, at the request of General Assembly's committee on education, a manual for use in family worship.

W. H. Wray Boyle, D. D.

Dr. Boyle is recognized as one of the most scholarly members of Chicago Presbytery. He has taken an active part in Christian Endeavor work, the Y. M. C. A., the brotherhood, evangelism, missions and social service. He has been in touch with colleges aside from Lake Forest, speaking at several college commencements last June. Woodward Avenue church has a membership of over 1,500, with a Sunday school of 1,600 members.

GYMNASIUM FOR DUBUQUE COLLEGE

An adequate gymnasium will soon be added to the equipment of Dubuque German College and Seminary, Dubuque, Iowa. Construction will begin at once. The Dubuque institution trains men of foreign parentage for religious leadership. Many students of the college, all men, enter the seminary at Dubuque or elsewhere and its graduates are scattered over the country as pastors and missionaries. The gymnasium will provide a much needed place of recreation for the students, many of whom come from farms and find the restraint of classrooms injurious to their health. The salary of a physical director has already been promised for three years. Dr. C. M. Steffens, the president, has received congratulations from all parts of the country on this prospective addition to the institution's equipment.

Y. M. C. A. College Has Foreign Students

The Young Men's Christian Association College is the new name of the institute and training school which has been conducted for a number of years at Chicago and Lake Geneva, Wis. The college this year has in training for secretarial work men from Australia, China and India. They expect to be Y. M. C. A. workers in their own countries. A new department, the school of boys' work, was opened this fall with thirteen students, representing eight states and Hawaii, Alberta and Ontario.

Subjects for the Week of Prayer

The Evangelical Alliance has just announced the following subjects for the Week of Prayer for 1914:

Monday, Jan. 6, "Confession and Thanksgiving."
Tuesday, Jan. 7, "The Church."
Wednesday, Jan. 8, "Nations and Rulers."
Thursday, Jan. 9, "Foreign Missions."
Friday, Jan. 10, "Home Missions."

Santa Claus Is Officially Recognized

According to a recent order by Postmaster General Burleson, letters addressed to Santa Claus will not be sent to the dead letter office as previously. The officials at Washington say they have discovered a way to reach the residence of the patron saint of Christmas. His address will be revealed only to kind-hearted individuals or organizations who apply to their local postoffice.

EXPERIMENT WITH COMBINED SERVICES

Two Omaha Congregations Try New Plan—Ministers Feel Need of Weekly Meeting—Bohemians Plan Improvements.

OMAHA—Castellar Street and Parkvale churches are each experimenting with a combination of two morning services. At Castellar church the Sunday school section of the service occurs first, while at Parkvale the sermon comes first.

Consider Evangelism—The afternoon and evening of Nov. 10 were given to a conference and retreat by the Presbyterian ministers. Evangelism was the topic of the papers, prayer and discussion. The season culminated in a united demand for a weekly prayer season of the ministers. The conference was one of three planned for Omaha Presbytery, Rev. C. C. Meek having in charge the local one.

Two Churches to Make Repairs—First church is making quite an outlay in reroofing its structure and thoroughly embellishing the public worship auditorium. — Bethlehem Bohemian church of South Omaha, Rev. Emanuel J. Kallina minister, is making a campaign for $1,100 for the improvement of the basement. This is the only Protestant church ministering to 2,700 souls in eighty-two blocks. Under present leadership the work is growing rapidly. As the membership is of the laboring class the people must look for assistance outside for this reconstruction work.

Show Increased Interest—Covenant church, C. H. Fleming pastor, is having prayer meeting attendances numbering half the membership of the church. Expositions in the gospel of John are the magnet.—Third church is experiencing a decided quickening since Robert Karr, a junior in the theological seminary, serves it regularly. During eighteen months without a pastor a heroic body of leaders have kept the church awakened. Both Mr. and Mrs. Karr are trained workers.

Personal Notes—With the first of this month J. Frank Young, D. D., assumed pastoral charge of Westminster church. The congregation rejoices that this last pastorless period was the shortest in its history. Dr. Young will locate at 2969 Harris street.—Melvin V. Higbee, D. D., of North church Nov. 9 dedicated a church in a former parish, Corning, Iowa.—Rev. W. N. Halsey, Rev. F. P. Ramsay and Rev. D. E. Jenkins each had a part on the regular program of the state teachers' association held in the city recently. Many Presbyterian elders from over the state were prominent among the speakers and leaders. R. H. H.

PASTORAL EVANGELISM DRAWS CROWDS

Former Moderator Has Big Audiences at Special Services—Seattle Invites Outside Pastors to Bible Conference.

SEATTLE—Dr. Matthews has demonstrated the effectiveness of pastoral evangelism in closing a two weeks' campaign in his church, in which he did all the preaching, with over 100 adults added to the church and many others uniting with other churches. The attendance averaged from 1,500 to 2,000 on week nights with capacity houses on Sundays.

Hold Bible Conferences—The Presbyterian ministerial union of the city held a retreat and Bible conference in Seattle Nov. 11-12 to which all the Presbyterian ministers of synod were invited. Over fifty outside the city accepted the invitation. "The Soul-Winning Pastor," "The Soul-Winning Church," "The Attractive Power of a Pure and Spiritual Church," "The Pastor and the Master" and other kindred themes made up the program.

Extend Sunday School Interests—W. O. Forbes, D. D., beginning with Nov. 1, will give all his time in organizing and superintending the interests of the Board of Publication and Sabbath School Work in synod and W. A. Major, D. D., will become one of the synodical home mission assistants. Dr. Major has been pastor of Bethany church, Seattle, for twenty years.

Many in New Church—Central church, Rev. Robert Asa Smith pastor, has just closed its charter roll with 130 members and over 200 in Sunday school. Nearly $1,000 has been subscribed for the new property and this will be supplemented by the mother church to the extent of $2,000.

Survey of All Sunday Schools — The denominational state Sunday school workers of the Pacific Northwest have organized themselves into a body for the purpose of promoting more effectively the work that is common to them. They will undertake immediately a survey of all the schools on the same lines and will hold a religious educational campaign in western Washington and Oregon in January.

FROM THE PACIFIC NORTHWEST

TACOMA—The churches at Enunclaw and Wabash have been transferred from Olympia to Seattle Presbytery. The pastor is Rev. John I. Clelland.—The evangelistic committee of the Presbytery of Olympia held a conference of all the ministers in First church, Tacoma, Nov. 18-19.—Elder John L. Randall of Bethany church is president of the Tacoma Union of Christian Endeavor. The union has been furnishing sacred music on Sundays for the prisoners on McNeil's island.—The Presbyterian Union has greatly improved the property at Knox mission and at the Eleventh Street mission. Regular services as well as excellent Sunday schools are being conducted in both missions. O. T. M.

WOMEN HAVE BEEN ACTIVE

PENNSYLVANIA—It was shown in reports of the annual meeting of the woman's synodical society of home missions at Erie, Pa., that the society during the past year has met all of its financial responsibilities. A total of $103,015 was contributed to home missions. This is the largest amount given by any synod. Miss Cameron Field, secretary of the Woman's Board of Home Missions, gave a realistic picture of the immigrants. Seventeen of the twenty presbyterial societies have already raised the amount pledged to the Bailey memorial pledge of $12,000 in honor of the late president of the synodical society, Mrs. Charles L. Bailey. All of the officers were reelected.

New Pastor in Old Church—Rev. D. W. Woods Nov. 6 was installed pastor of Lower Marsh Creek church in a building which has been used more than a century. It is located on the line of the Confederate advance at the battle of Gettysburg. Ministers participating were George Fulton, R. F. McClean, F. E. Taylor, W. S. Barnes.

Revival Closes Saloon—"Old Pequea" church in Lancaster county has enjoyed a season of refreshing. The pastor, Rev. William Bullock, was assisted in two weeks' special services by neighboring pastors. Afterwards Evangelists H. N. Faulconer and S. S. Aikman spent several days with him. The country community was wonderfully moved. At the communion service on Nov. 9 a large number were received and baptized. As one effect a hotel within the bounds of the congregation will be closed at the expiration of the lease. "Never," say the owners of the property, "will it again be leased for the purposes of a saloon."—Rev. William M. Woodfin, pastor of Swarthmore church, is chairman of the executive committee of the Delaware County No License League. He says that the movement against the saloon is gaining renewed interest.

DISCUSS PROHIBITION FOR CHICAGO

Representatives of Many Organizations Will Consider Policy—Harvey Men Build Parish House —Maywood Church to Burn Mortgage.

CHICAGO—Next Monday at the City Club representatives from eighty-six religious and other organizations will meet to discuss the advisability of attempting to obtain prohibition of liquor selling in Chicago next spring. The Presbyterian ministers will be represented by Dr. Duncan C. Milner. The ministerial association sympathizes with the movement, but believes the present not an opportune time to push the matter. The meeting will be under the auspices of the Anti-Saloon League.

Men Build Parish House—The men of Harvey church, who recently decided that a parish house was necessary to help the church fill its place in the community, have been constructing the building themselves on Saturday afternoons.

Will Burn Mortgage—After long effort, the mortgage of $3,600 on Maywood church has been paid and the mortgage will be burned next Sunday at 4 o'clock. The pastor, Rev. Edgar Beckwith, will speak. In addition to the amount of the mortgage the church has raised $800 for repairs already made. Two church edifices of this church were burned within a few years of each other. The work of raising the money was initiated by the brotherhood of the church.

Salvation Army Head Speaks—General Bramwell Booth, head of the Salvation Army, arrived in Chicago a week ago on his first visit to this city. General Booth is in command of 15,000 officers and cadets who have charge of 9,000 corps. The organization issues eighty-two periodicals and conducts scores of industrial homes, shelters for women and children, industrial schools and other uplift agencies in thirty-four different countries. He was greeted enthusiastically in this city.

Refuse to Change Name—The congregation of Fourth church recently refused by a vote of 136 to 18 to change the name of the church to Northminster as had been proposed.

Organize to Aid Charities—Beginning Nov. 24 a campaign will be made to obtain $350,000 for the United Charities of Chicago. Plans were laid at a recent meeting of some of the city's wealthiest citizens. A hundred teams will collect subscriptions.

New Director at Moody Institute—Rev. W. W. Ketchum, for several years a member of the faculty of Bible Teachers' Training School, New York, has become associated with Moody Bible Institute as director of the practical work. He will have oversight of the actual work of students in churches, Sunday schools, missions, tents, gospel wagons and in homes.

Will Try to Reach More Italians—Rev. Eugene De Luca of Chicago Heights last Saturday spoke to 150 Italians in a hall at Coal City despite the opposition of priests. This is the first Protestant work done for the 1,000 Italians of that vicinity. Sunday he preached in the Presbyterian church and lectured to a crowded house in the evening. The Church Extension Board may attempt work at this center.

Arouse Whole Community—Teams of Buena Memorial church expect to complete the task of raising $125,000 for their new church by next Monday night. In the first six days $30,136 had been pledged. The ten teams are hard at work each evening this week following dinner served at the church.

Brief Bits of News—Rev. James L. McBride of Rogers Park church is the author of a Christmas booklet, "The Innkeeper of Bethlehem."—Men of Evanston First church to the number of seventy-one lunched together at the Union League Club last week. — Dr. McClure of McCormick Seminary preached at the University of Chicago Nov. 9.—Special meetings every evening this week are being held in Oak Park First church. Pastors of the city are preaching.—Dr. Hill and Dr. Luccock were speakers at a recent annual dinner of Wilmette church.—Dr. F. M. Fox spoke to the boys of Wheaton church last Friday, when the new billiard tables were first used in the social room of that church. — The Illinois Federation of Women's Clubs last week at Evanston adopted resolutions to use every opportunity at the ballot box to add Illinois to the list of dry states.—Sixty-five churches have been represented at the men's Tuesday luncheons held under the auspices of the brotherhood. Two more will be held in the present series.—Over 1,000 persons attended a reception last Friday at the housewarming of the manse recently purchased for Dr. Covert of First church.—"Shut-ins" were taken to the flower show at Garfield park this week by members of First U. P. church.

UNVEIL TABLET TO DR. HUBBARD

NEW YORK—Nov. 9 at a special 5 o'clock service in First church, Auburn, a bronze tablet on a background of Alps green marble was unveiled to the memory of the late William Henry Hubbard, D. D., LL. D., for twenty-five years pastor of the church. Besides the present pastor, Dr. C. S. Richards, those participating in the service were President James D. Moffatt of Washington, Pa., who spoke of Dr. Hubbard's great work in the interest of systematic beneficence in the whole church, and Dr. John B. Hill of New York City, special representative of the joint executive committee of the General Assembly. Dr. John Quincy Adams of the theological seminary made the prayer of dedication and the Scripture lesson was read by Rev. V. N. Yergin of Calvary church, Auburn.

Notable Series of Sermons—Heroes of the church have been discussed in a series of sermons by different speakers on Sunday evenings in Central church, Auburn. In addition to the pastor, Dr. Frederick W. Palmer, the speakers have been Doctors R. H. Nichols, W. J. Hinke and A. S. Hoyt of Auburn Seminary, Dr. A. C. Flick of Syracuse University and President K. D. Macmillan of Wells College.

BEST NEWS FROM FOUR STATES

To Make Churches Efficient—A committee was recently appointed by Central Washington Presbytery to confer with a similar committee of the M. E. conference to arrange if possible for the exchange of churches in weak communities where one church is sufficient.

Promise Chapel for China — Portland, Ind., church, Rev. S. W. Huffer pastor, has promised money for a chapel in the market place of Kachek, Hainan, China, where Rev. David Tappan, Jr., is stationed. He recently addressed the church as part of the China campaign now in progress in that state.

Is This the Longest Record?—Here is an addition to the record of exceptionally long service of laymen as Sunday school superintendents as recently published in The Continent. The record of forty-five years' continuous service by W. K. Cowan of Oskaloosa, Iowa, is exceeded by another Iowa man, B. M. Harger of Westminster church, Dubuque, who is just beginning his forty-ninth year as superintendent.

Put Organ Above Church Level—The church at Pomeroy, Ohio, which was badly damaged by the flood, has been remodeled and was recently dedicated by Rev. D. D. Bigger of Tiffin. The organ and electric motor by which it is operated have been placed above the flood line in view of future possibilities. The entrance has been moved and other changes have been made. The church expects soon to call a pastor.

Duplex RICHMOND PATENTED D E TRADEMARK

He Did Not Get the Original Duplex

A Church Treasurer wrote us a few days ago:

"The envelopes I ordered from you through——are not glued properly, as you can see by the one enclosed. Our Church Council thinks you ought to refund half the cost. The envelopes are not as heavy, either, as your samples were."

The writer (whose name and address will be given on request) wanted the original Duplex and thought he was getting it. But the dealer substituted without letting him know. If you order through an agent specify DUPLEX-RICHMOND, VA. Note the trade-mark. The original Duplex is absolutely guaranteed. If you find a defect of any kind, not half the cost, but the whole cost, will be refunded by return mail.

The Duplex Envelope System for the Church and the Robert Raikes Duplex for the Sunday School are both fully explained in "DUPLEX CHURCH AND SUNDAY SCHOOL METHODS"—64 pages illustrated. Write for a copy and for free DUPLEX UNIT No. 39.

BIBLE LEADERS OF COUNTRY GATHER

Many Simultaneous Meetings Attended by Crowds—Bethany Church Glad to Have Dr. Jarvis Back Again After Sickness.

PHILADELPHIA—A Bible conference covering two weeks began Nov. 10. Meetings have been held daily at noonday in Chambers-Wylie church and in a vacant store at Sixth and Chestnut. Each afternoon a meeting is held in the church and each evening there have been from twelve to fifteen meetings in different churches throughout the city. Among the prominent speakers are Dr. James M. Gray of Chicago, Dr. C. I. Schofield of New York, Rev. P. W. Phillpott of Hamilton, Canada, Rev. Robert McMurdo of Chicago, Rev. R. V. Miller of Spartansburg, S. C., Rev. A. P. Mershon of Kingston, Ont. The meetings have been in the main well attended. They originated chiefly in the minds of prominent laymen who stood ready to meet the expense.

Will Press Evangelism and Missions—Evangelism and missions were prominent in the sessions of presbytery and arrangements were made to press these upon the attention of the churches. Missions in the Sunday school was the theme of an interesting talk by Miss V. V. Penrose and "The Children of the Church" the subject of a conference conducted by Rev. R. P. D. Bennett.

Glad to Have Pastor Back—As a manifestation of affection and joy over his return the ovation recently tendered Dr. R. E. L. Jarvis by Bethany people was very remarkable. A set of beautiful silver spoons was presented by the session partly in commemoration of the pastor's return and also in recognition of the nineteenth anniversary of his marriage.

Personal Notes—Rev. J. Alvin Orr, for twelve years pastor of Morris Square U. P. church, said farewell on a recent Sunday to the congregation, having accepted a call to First church, North Side, Pittsburg.—On Monday, Nov. 24, the Presbyterian ministers will be treated to a conference on "The Church and Charity." It will be led by Rev. R. M. Little.—A service in memory of the late Robert C. Ogden was recently held by Hollond Memorial Sunday school, of which he was superintendent for eighteen years. W. P. White.

PROPOSE TO PREVENT OVERLAPPING

ST. LOUIS—Presbytery has presented an overture to the committee on location of religious enterprises of the Church Federation asking all participating denominations to unite in adopting a policy to undertake no new work until it shall have been approved by a council representing the denominations. The M. E. Church has agreed.

At Work Quarter Century—West church, of which Dr. F. W. Russell has been pastor for nearly ten years, celebrated its twenty-fifth anniversary Nov. 16 with special services.

Dedicate Chapel—Rev. T. C. McNary, formerly of Richmond, Ind., preached his first sermon as pastor of Lee Avenue church Nov. 9, at which time the new chapel was also dedicated.

AMONG OHIO'S MANY CHURCHES

OHIO—Dr. W. F. Weir of Wooster assisted at the rededication of West Broad Street church, Columbus, Nov. 9. This structure was damaged by the flood last spring. The pastor is Rev. William A. Perrins.

Extension Board Active—Much has been accomplished recently in Cincinnati by the newly organized church extension committee, Dr. F. N. McMillan chairman, Rev. W. D. Malcolm secretary. A lot has been obtained together with $1,000 for a church in Oakley; a lot has been obtained for a colored church downtown, and arrangements are under way to plant a mission on West Prince hill in a building formerly used as a golf clubhouse.

Men to Meet—Men of Cincinnati will meet for dinner at Avondale church Tuesday before Thanksgiving. Dr. William F. Weir, Wooster, will speak on "Manhood's Call to Service." Robert P. Hargitt of the national council of the brotherhood will preside.

TWO NEW PASTORS AT TOPEKA

KANSAS—The installation of Rev. E. I. Gilmore as pastor of Third church, Topeka, Oct. 26 was an interesting event. Dr. S. S. Estey, Rev. Ralph Ward and Rev. J. P. Hicks participated. A splendid feature of this church is a junior sermon preceding the regular sermon. It is listened to by about 300 children, who are permitted to retire at its close.—The pastor of Second church, Topeka, Rev. J. P. Hicks, was installed Nov. 2 in a service conducted by Rev. John Fazel and Rev. E. I. Gilmore. The pastor has been selected to deliver the Thanksgiving sermon at the union service of Presbyterians, Methodists, Baptists and Christians.

Urge Evangelism—Presbytery of Topeka conducted several retreats Nov. 4. One was held in Topeka First church, Dr. Stephen S. Estey, pastor, presiding. The note of evangelism was sounded throughout the meeting.—The ministerial union of Topeka is arranging for an "Everybody at Church Day." An effort will be put forth to get every citizen of Topeka to attend some church on this day.

Have New Schoolrooms—First church, Leavenworth, Kan., R. B. A. McBride, D. D., pastor, dedicated new Sabbath school rooms Nov. 16 costing when furnished between $8,000 and $9,000. The rooms were made possible by the gift by Omar Abernathy of $5,000 in memory of his wife. The church now has more than thirty classrooms besides two large assembly rooms in the Sabbath school department.

Met at Atchison—The Kansas synodical society met at Atchison church Oct. 28-30 with the largest attendance in the history of the organization. This church has recently dedicated a $5,000 organ. The pastor is Dr. W. I. Alexander.

CONSIDER THE UNION OF TWO BOARDS

Assembly Committee on Education Meets—Presbytery Takes Steps to Stop Sunday Desecration and Illegal Liquor Selling.

PITTSBURG—The committee appointed by General Assembly on the educational policy of the Presbyterian Church met Nov. 13 in Third church. Plans for the consolidation of the College Board and the Board of Education were considered, along with a general scheme for the unification of all the educational policies of the church. The committee is composed of Dr. W. L. McEwan, chairman; Dr. Ira Landrith, John Willis Baer, Dr. C. B. McAfee, Rev. Robert Clements, Dr. F. W. Hinitt, Dr. W. H. Bocock, J. H. Finley and Judge W. F. Potter. Subcommittees were appointed to look into every phase of the problem.

Union Banquets; Endeavorers Meet—The annual Presbyterian Union banquet will be held Nov. 25; place not yet announced. The speaker will be Newell Dwight Hillis, D. D., pastor of Plymouth church, Brooklyn. J. T. Gillespie, president of the union, will preside.—The Christian Endeavor executive committee of Allegheny county sent several representatives to the state executive committee meeting at Harrisburg Nov. 20, among them Dr. W. A. Jones, state president, and H. A. Rhoads.

Sunday Work—An appeal was made to the authorities of the city by presbytery to stop all unnecessary Sunday work which has resulted in the stopping of work on several large buildings and the closing of numerous small stores in different sections of the city. A crusade is also on against the selling of liquor to minors in downtown cafes, which has resulted in evidence being presented to the authorities against a number of proprietors.

W. P. Snyder.

BANQUET TO CLOSE MISSION WEEK

NEW JERSEY—Home mission week in Newark is to close with a banquet for men Nov. 20 at which District Attorney Whitman of New York will speak. The same afternoon there will be a luncheon for women.—New Jersey Sunday School Association held its fifty-fifth annual convention at Asbury Park Nov. 11 to 13.

Plan New Building—The church at Franklin is planning the erection of a new building. The edifice will be of stucco and will contain a Sunday school room, auditorium, social room and kitchen. The site has been given to the congregation by the New Jersey Zinc Company.

Chance for Service — Newark Neighborhood House has issued a plea for volunteers who will give one evening a week, from 7:30 to 9:30, to boys' work. Some of the activities of the house are athletic, manual training, table games and dramatics. The work of the settlement has been seriously handicapped by lack of men leaders.

Baltimore Church 150 Years Old

The 150th anniversary of First church, Baltimore, Md., Dr. Alfred H. Barr pastor, was celebrated by special services extending over a week. Dr. F. L. Patton of Princeton preached one morning. All of the Presbyterian churches of Baltimore except the two U. P. churches sprang directly or indirectly from this organization. Robert E. Speer made the closing address Nov. 16 and spoke with Dr. Patton to students the same afternoon.

Stop Much Sunday Labor

Due to the agitation of barbers Aurora, Ill., has recently adopted an ordinance prohibiting Sunday work except in certain cases. Street cars, theaters, tobacco stores and restaurants are exempted and by inference the council expresses the opinion that these institutions are necessary on Sunday.

Dr. John J. Milman, assistant pastor of Second church, Newark, has developed a stereopticon lecture on the anthracite mines of Pennsylvania which shows brilliantly the facts of child labor in the mines. Like Dr. John R. Davies of Philadelphia and Dr. John McDowell of Newark, Dr. Milman came out of the mines to enter the ministry and has himself served as a breaker boy.

Hallowed Hymns New and Old

Edited by IRA ALLAN SANKEY

(Adapted to all depts. of church work)

Rev. Donald M. Grant,
Secretary Evangelistic Committee of the Presbytery of Cincinnati, says:

"During the great Gipsy Smith meetings held in our city, we used Hallowed Hymns with great satisfaction. Several Pastors, and I am one of them, are using them in their midweek services, Sunday School, Young People's meetings and Sunday Evening services. I have examined nearly every so-called Gospel Hymn Book on the market and I consider Hallowed Hymns the best."

Books

America's splendidly resourceful publishing houses are now issuing scores of books of all sorts. Fiction for all tastes, volumes of essays on religious and historical subjects, books for girls, books for boys—how can the worth-while volumes be culled?

The Continent—and The Interior—for many years has been known for the excellence of its book department. A large staff of reviewers take all the books as they are issued and read them from the point of view of The Continent family. Each reviewer gives a summary of the book, indicates its character, and expresses his judgment clearly, so that the prospective buyer can easily make his own decision as to its desirability.

At this time of year specially large space is given to books, because this is the high tide of book publishing. Hundreds of our readers are preparing to secure their winter reading, or to purchase books for Christmas gifts. No other paper of its class attempts the task which The Continent has assumed in describing the worthy books and guarding the home from unworthy ones.

Among our reviewers are nearly a score of men and women who specialize in accordance with their particular equipment for expressing judgment. Every classification is cared for by some one who can speak with authority, and who at the same time has a sympathetic understanding of the requirements of Continent readers. The staff is under the direction of Margaret C. Anderson, literary Editor of The Continent.

The Continent costs only five cents a week at your home.

GET $2,275,000 IN FIRST THREE DAYS

Campaign for Christian Associations Arouses Much Interest—Churches and Missions Celebrate Anniversaries.

NEW YORK—A total of $2,275,534 of the $4,000,000 being asked for by the Y. M. and Y. W. C. A. was raised in three days of the special campaign now in progress. Great enthusiasm has been aroused in all parts of the city and surrounding territory over the movement. Large clocks in many parts of the city record the growing total. One gift of $2,500 came anonymously by cable. Another man, reclaimed by the Bowery branch, gave $12. Gifts come from all classes of people. The women are vying with the men in the totals collected daily by the various teams.

To Offset Sunday Moving Pictures — Bethany church, Brooklyn, Rev. Louis O. Rotenbach pastor, has instituted an illustrated lecture at the close of Sunday school every Sabbath. The pastor speaks about the day's study, illustrating it with stereopticon slides. The children are called upon to answer questions put to them from the platform. The new departure is meeting with great success and was originated in an endeavor to offset the lure which the moving picture shows have for Sunday school children.

Declines Chicago Call—Dr. S. Parkes Cadman, pastor of Central Congregational church, Brooklyn, has declined for the second time the call of Second church, Chicago. At the Sunday morning service, Nov. 9, Dr. Cadman read his letter of declination. As he concluded the organ gave forth the opening bars of the "Hallelujah Chorus" and the large choir sang it joyously. Dr. Cadman was unable to conceal his emotion, for this part of the service was entirely unexpected by him. Dr. Cadman said that although the Second church's call was a most "generous and kind" one, he felt it his duty to remain in Brooklyn.

Classis and Presbytery Meet—The Classis of New York and the Presbytery of New York met Nov. 10 for an afternoon of devotion on invitation of the classis. The ministers who took part for the Reformed Church were Rev. A. J. Muste, Fort Washington Reformed Church, Rev. Henry E. Cobb, Collegiate church, and Rev. E. G. W. Meury, Knox Memorial Reformed church. The Presbyterian Church was represented by Dr. George Alexander, University Place church, Dr. Henry Sloane Coffin, Madison Avenue, Dr. John R. Mackay, North church. Two elders also spoke—R. H. Robinson of Thirty-Fourth Street Reformed church and Frederick A. Wallis of Fifth Avenue church.

Ex-President Speaks at Memorial Service—Ex-President Taft was the principal speaker at the memorial service for the late Robert C. Ogden Nov. 9 in First church, Brooklyn, where Mr. Ogden was a member for twenty-one years, thirteen of which he served as deacon. Among the others who took part were Rev. L. Mason Clarke, pastor, Job E. Hedges, who was associated with Mr. Ogden on the board of trustees of Hampton Institute, and Dr. Hollis B. Frissell, president of Hampton Institute.

Council of Women to Meet—The Council of Women for Home Missions will hold its sixth annual meeting Dec. 3 and 4 in Fifth Avenue Baptist church. The Thursday afternoon meeting will be open to the public, when Mrs. George Coleman of Boston, president of the council, Mrs. Ida Vose Woodbury and Mrs. Lemuel Call Barnes, author of "Early Stories and Songs for New Students in English," will address the gathering. At the close of this session members and friends of the council will gather at the Manhattan Hotel for a buffet supper and "get together" evening.

Four Anniversaries—West Twenty-Third Street church, Rev. H. G. Mendenhall pastor, last Friday held its fifth anniversary under its present name, The church is 89 years old, but five years ago was reorganized and the name it bore then, Westminster, was changed to West Twenty-Third Street. Dr. Mendenhall and his assistant, Rev. W. D. Buchanan, have built the church up remarkably.—Springfield, Long Island, church celebrated last week its forty-sixth anniversary. It was announced at the closing meeting on Wednesday that the committee which had been appointed to raise funds to pay off the $5,000 debt on the building had collected over $4,000. Among visitors who took part were Rev. Andrew Magill, Dr. John R. Kerr and Rev. Newell Woolsey Wells. Rev. Sidney H. Barrett is pastor.—Bowery mission celebrated last week the thirty-fourth anniversary of its founding. Nov. 9 the anniversary sermon was preached by Rev. G. S. Avery. Evangelistic services were held in the evening. Monday night a memorial tablet to the late Dr. Louis Klopsch was unveiled by his daughter, Miss Mary Klopsch.—The Eighth Avenue mission is celebrating this week its fourteenth anniversary. Some of the speakers on the program are Rev. Albert L. Evans of John Hall chapel, Dr. John R. Mackay of North church and Rev. Henry Frost of the China Inland Mission.

Brief Items—Labor Temple, Dr. Jonathan H. Day superintendent, has organized a needlework guild which is affiliated with the National Needlework Guild. Instruction in garment making and fancy sewing will be given.—New York State International Sunshine Society, southern division, held its annual all-day conference Nov. 18 at 131 Lexington avenue.—The Harriet Judson, new boarding department of the Brooklyn Y. W. C. A., has just been opened at Nevins and Schermerhorn streets. The charge for room and board runs from $3.50 to $7 a week.—The annual meeting of the Long Island Bible Society was held Nov. 12 at First church, Huntington, L. I., Dr. J. J. Johnstone pastor.—The New York Indian Association held its annual meeting Monday morning in the West-Park church. H. Rae Cloud, a fullblood Indian who was educated at Auburn Seminary, addressed the gathering.—Sunday evening, Nov. 23, the Salvation Army will formally welcome its new head, General Bramwell Booth, at a meeting in Carnegie Hall. District Attorney Whitman will preside.—Sir William Ramsay of Oxford, England, was the guest of honor at the clerical conference of the Federation of Churches last Monday. He postponed his return home to attend.

MICHIGAN—Monroe church is making repairs costing $2,000. A new lighting system will be installed soon.

Thank Pastor for His Help — The assistance which Rev. S. V. Reagan and his wife have been to the Christian Endeavorers of Grace church, Saginaw, was recently expressed by the young people at a special meeting. This society during the three years of the pastorate of Mr. Reagan has grown from twenty-one to seventy-five members. A gymnasium has been installed and an endowment of $10,000 for the church obtained.

ing the people the right to vote thus on the question of national prohibition. And Mr. Clark murmured, meditatively: "I suspect you are right."

Notable Convert to Prohibition and Gospel

Such is a summary of what the convention did, but the doing of it was accomplished through many intense and dramatic scenes which stirred crowded audiences in the Ohio capital's great Memorial hall as the winds stir the waves of the sea. Of such incidents the superlative one was the speech of ex-Governor M. R. Patterson of Tennessee. As is commonly known throughout the country, the Anti-Saloon League of that state, fighting to establish in Tennessee statewide prohibition, found its bitterest foe in Mr. Patterson, then chief executive in the capitol at Nashville. Patterson was beaten, but he remained a thorn in the side of the temperance leaders, defending the nullification of the prohibitory law in the state's largest cities. Then suddenly came an astounding change. The ex-governor joined the church in Memphis and forthwith brought forth works meet for repentance by traveling the state as a public advocate not alone of law enforcement but of the total annihilation of the liquor traffic. For this reason he was invited to speak at the Columbus convention.

Ex-Governor Patterson was manly but not presuming. His whole manner was singularly humble yet positive and unflinching. He said: "I am neither abashed nor ashamed to acknowledge my error. I have been an apologist for the saloon. I am now convinced that there is no place for the saloon in a Christian civilization." But this confession of a new-made man's new political faith, though it moved the audience deeply, did not affect it with the profound surge of spiritual feeling that responded to Mr. Patterson's simple testimony of the conversion of his soul. He spoke with low, tense fervency.

"I went in my distresses to the throne of God. There the curtains of my night parted. I arose a changed man. I stand here a ready and willing witness to the miraculous power of God to cleanse the human soul. I was unhappy and out of harmony with God. I am here today happy and at harmony with him."

Many wept and all over the house resounded cries "Bless the Lord!" "Amen!" "Praise God!" Touched beyond expression, yet speaking still with perfect command of musical eloquence, the distinguished convert held his hearers breathless as for nearly an hour he took up his own former arguments opposing prohibition and overwhelmed them with a Christian man's arguments in its behalf. The league has asked the ex-governor to become one of its national lecturers in the forthcoming campaign. He has not yet decided as to that, but he said publicly that he had dedicated the rest of his life to do what he could for the worldwide extinction of the liquor business.

Allies from Catholic Church and from Congress

The presence of two Catholic priests on the convention platform lent piquancy to the program. One of these, Father Patrick Murphy of Dalhart, Tex., whose parish consists of three counties in the western extension of Oklahoma and seven in the panhandle of Texas, threw the convention into tumults of delight with his fiery oratory assailing the saloon. Father J. J. Curran of Wilkes-Barre, Pa., known widely as a close personal friend of ex-President Roosevelt, spoke more mildly, but with equal positiveness. Both priests were eager to demonstrate that their church left its membership free to act with Protestants in antagonism to the drink evil and the saloon power.

Major J. B. Merwin of Washington was a picturesque figure in the convention hall. He told the convention again the famous story of how Abraham Lincoln said to him in private conversation the very day of Booth's tragic deed: "Slavery is abolished. The next great question is the overthrow of the legalized liquor traffic."

The enormous political power which the Anti-Saloon League has already drawn into alliance with it was indexed by the number of important executive and legislative officials in attendance. The most popular of these was undoubtedly Congressman Richmond P. Hobson of Alabama. The convention explicitly indorsed Mr. Hobson's candidacy for the United States senate in the pending campaign in Alabama. Congressman William H. Murray, Oklahoma's "Alfalfa Bill," and Congressman Clyde Kelly, the young Bible class teacher who last fall beat the veteran John Dalzell in Pittsburg, were other speakers from the hall of representatives in Washington. At least three senators would have also been present if the condition of business in the senate had permitted their absence.

To the force of the delegation from Congress was added the presence of three governors now in office (besides the two ex-governors already mentioned)—Hooper of Tennessee, Hodges of Kansas and Hanna of North Dakota. Governor Hodges said he owed his election solely to the temperance sentiment of Kansas, since his republican opponent who should normally have had a big majority was accused of advertising the "jug trade" and lost only on that account.

The "get together" sessions on Friday following the adjournment of the regular convention were doubtless disappointing to many who expected, as Congressman Hobson in particular insisted, that the party Prohibitionists and prohibitionists in the other parties would come to some agreement for common action in regard to electing congressmen favorable to the proposed prohibition amendment. But conference between the leaders of the league and of the party had made it clear enough that any effort at a common program of political method would develop more contention than harmony. What was finally done by the conference (over which Dr. Ira Landrith of Nashville presided) was confined to the area of temperance education, where it was felt that all opinions would find a scientific ground on which to stand together.

A committee was appointed with Daniel A. Poling of the Prohibition party as chairman and Ernest H. Cherrington of the Anti-Saloon League as secretary, empowered to issue literature and conduct scientific antialcohol congresses with a view to developing intelligent public sentiment against the use of intoxicating liquors. The W. C. T. U. and the International Sunday School Association are strongly represented on this committee.

ANTI-SALOON LEAGUE INDORSED

A call for a meeting of Presbyterian ministers and elders attending the Anti-Saloon League convention at Columbus brought together eighty men who recorded their names in approval of a resolution written by Dr. Ira Landrith, briefly stating that it was the sense of the Presbyterian ministers and elders present that the Anti-Saloon League should receive the encouragement and support of the Presbyterian Church and of the Temperance Board thereof.

POLICE CHIEF REMOVED FROM OFFICE

Mass Meeting of 3,000 Citizens Demands Purer Civic Life—Mormons Blocked in Effort to Buy House of Worship.

ST. PAUL-MINNEAPOLIS—Indication of the influence of an aroused public was the effect of the citizens' meeting held in the St. Paul auditorium under the auspices of a score of churchmen, ministers and laymen. About 3,000 citizens gathered and in no uncertain terms demanded the righting of some civic wrongs. The chief of police and a number of patrolmen have already been removed.

Mormons to Hold Convention—The Twin Cities have become a center of activity for the Mormons of the northwest. Their missionaries are making a house-to-house visitation with insistent solicitation. A convention to be attended by hundreds of delegates is announced for Minneapolis. Regular services have been held in the Midway district and recently the attempt was made to buy a church property formerly in the possession of the Congregationalists. As this chapel is in the parish of Knox Presbyterian church, the pastor, Rev. B. Scott Bates, took immediate steps to thwart the designs of the Latter Day Saints. The law estopped the sale and he is now arranging to purchase the property as a chapel for Knox church.

Brief Items—Rev. T. S. Thompson from North Dakota was recently installed at Shakopee by a committee of St. Paul Presbytery.—Zion church, St. Paul, is now in possession of the best church building for colored Christians in the northwest. Dedicatory services are awaiting the completion of the manse being built on an adjoining lot.—Rev. Hugh Kane is ministering to Westminster church, St. Paul.—Bethlehem German church is desirous of finding an efficient man who can preach both in German and English.—Vanderburgh Memorial and Elim churches of Minneapolis, happily united under the name of Vanderburgh, will soon claim as pastor Rev. H. W. Fisher of Cincinnati.

Elders to Meet Soon—The evangelistic committee of both presbyteries called the brethren together recently for a day of retreat in Minneapolis Normal Bible Institute. Dr. Stanley Roberts for Minneapolis and Dr. Harry Noble Wilson for St. Paul have arranged for a similar evangelistic conference in the same place upon the part of the elders. This will be held Dec. 5. An interchurch visitation by the elders is also being planned.

Move Church a Mile—It is expected that by Thanksgiving the remodeled Rosedale church, Minneapolis, will be ready for occupancy. The church was moved a mile and enlarged. In the meantime the congregation is meeting in a near-by Lutheran church on Sunday afternoon.

The Presbyterian Church has $7,000,000 invested in home mission buildings.

Financial Situation

Reports of Business Conditions Both Here and Abroad Show Diverse Currents—Railway Employees Win Increase.

Reports of business conditions both in this country and abroad seem to be diverse in character. Holiday business is growing, buyers seem anxious for immediate shipments, and trade in most lines is as heavy as on the corresponding week a year ago. There has been a slowing down in the steel trade, however, and the worsted mills are waiting for free wool. In Germany, on the other hand, the discount rate has been reduced, showing easier money tendencies there. In London, however, many members of the stock exchange have little to do and there are rumors that 200 members of the exchange will retire soon. This lessening of stock trading is not in itself harmful but indicates a lack of business confidence among men of money. In this country the price of farm products, especially corn, is bringing extra wealth to the farmers. Business failures during October were much larger than during the previous month, showing the highest business mortality rate since January. To find an equally large number of failures in October one must go back eighteen years. H. B. Hollins and Company of New York, a brokerage firm, failed for about $3,000,000 last week. The beginning of their trouble is said to have been during the panic of 1907, when they accumulated some unprofitable property. The bank clearings during October show an increase over September.

Stock Ownership Fascinates—The ownership of stocks has a fascination for many people which seems not to adhere to mortgages and similar staid forms of capital. The recent announcement that the average dividend of the Fall River mills for the fourth quarter was 3.61 per cent would indicate that stock in cotton mills is particularly desirable if the price is not too great. As a matter of fact, however, this figure includes a stock dividend which runs the average very high. Last year the average dividend for the same quarter was only 1.09 per cent and the total dividend for 1912 was about 4 per cent. Dividends from these mills, just as dividends from other stocks, depend on the price of raw material and the labor conditions, as well as the demand for goods. If there are many strikes, with loss of production, the dividends are likely to decrease. If there are too many mills producing for the demand, or if the demand swings to other forms of goods for the time being, sales and profits fall off. This may happen to any concern. Sound bonds and mortgages, being based on the assets of the concern, constitute a fixed charge which must be paid before the dividends are allowed, and although the incomes from the more stable investments grow no larger, neither do they become smaller unless the concern becomes bankrupt, in which case the property back of the bond or mortgage may be taken to satisfy the security holders. If there is anything left the stockholders get a share. The buying of stock in companies which have no tangible assets but plenty of prospects according to the promoter, is to be avoided by men and women who have no money to lose.

Good Season for Colorado—While the farmers of Kansas in many places have little to show for their season's work, the harvest in the neighboring state of Colorado has been a record breaker. It is estimated that the total value of farm products will be $115,000,000, double the value of five years ago. Much of the land of the state is irrigated, although the semiarid region of Eastern Colorado produced much of the wealth. The potato crop totals 7,000,000 bushels.

Raise Wages of Railway Men—The award of the arbitration committee considering the request for higher wages by employees of eastern railways gives the men about 7 per cent increase, based on the higher cost of living. This will take $6,000,000 annually from the earnings of the roads. The award holds for a year and is the first fruits of the hurriedly prepared amendment to the Erdman act rushed through Congress several months ago.

Imports Fail to Change Meat Prices—Although in a recent month 30,000,000 pounds of meat have been imported, prices are as high or higher than before the passage of the recent tariff law. Practically no meat was imported previous to last July.

Shall We All Raise Chickens?—Eggs recently sold for 75 cents a dozen on the Philadelphia retail market. They were warranted only twenty-four hours old and were of extra size. The usual price is 55 to 60 cents a dozen.

Open College Y. W. C. A. Building

The home of the Y. W. C. A. of the University of Illinois, a $60,000 building, was dedicated Nov. 9 by Bishop McDowell of the M. E. Church. The building will furnish a religious and social center and serve as dormitory for fifty young women. It was built through gifts of friends in Urbana and Champaign. Congressman W. B. McKinley gave $20,000 and the building is named after his mother, Hannah McKinley.

Football Player to Indian Missionary

Several years ago a representative of Dubuque German College and Seminary, scouting through Nebraska for recruits to the Christian work for foreigners to be trained at that institution, stopped one day with a German farmer. A son of the recent citizen of the Fatherland was outside practicing for a coming football game. The indication of the ready adaptation to American customs by the boy impressed the educator. Closer acquaintance reenforced the first impression and overtures were made to him to go to Dubuque to attend school. Several years later he was graduated from that institution.

For three years this young man has now been a missionary under the Home Board working with the Pima Indians in Arizona. He is one of many who have left this "home mission factory" to do their share in bringing the peoples of America to a higher realization of the part they should play in a democracy.

Information about other of our graduates will be gladly furnished on request to C. M. Steffens, D. D., president Dubuque German College and Seminary, Dubuque, Iowa.

WORK OVER STATE SHOWS BIG INCREASE

Two Churches Forced to Increase Accommodations—Sunday School Training Is a Strong Feature in Many Congregations.

NEBRASKA—Broadwater church in Box Butte Presbytery dedicated a new building Nov. 9. William H. Kearns, D. D., of Minneapolis, Minn., conducted the day's services. — The church at O'Neill is improving and enlarging its building to accommodate a growing departmental work. Rev. George Longstaff is pastor.

Hear Lecture at Dinner—The parishioners of Raymond church, Rev. J. C. Wilson pastor, gathered recently for a church dinner on Saturday. Rev. Ralph H. Houseman, synodical educational superintendent, gave a lecture on "The Boy Plus His Father."

Organizes Two Endeavor Societies—Rev. George McDougall in four months' pastorate at Bridgeport has seen two Endeavor societies organized—a junior and young people's—the Sunday school increased in attendance, the efficiency standard of the synod adopted, and a teacher training class started. The Endeavor society is having an attendance of fifty.

Sunday School Graduates Teachers—Loup City church has all its religious leaders active in Sunday school. This department is now the strongest in its history. It was among the first in the synod to adopt the twenty-point efficiency standard. Recently a Sunday school rally season was featured by a banquet to the workers on Saturday evening and on Sunday evening the graduation of five persons in teacher training, including the pastor, Rev. John C. Tourtellot. The district educational superintendent, Rev. Ralph H. Houseman, gave an address and conferred diplomas. Another class in teacher training has been started.

Beatrice Church Advancing—Perhaps few parishes of the west have shown more consistent advance in five years than the church at Beatrice. The church, taken as a unit, is one of the most admirably balanced of any in synod. The young people's society averages upward of 100 in attendance. The pastor, Leon C. Young, D. D., greets Sunday audiences as large in numbers and steady in attendance as face any Presbyterian minister of synod. Gifts of the people under the single budget plan have increased many fold. Only one church of synod exceeds this one in benevolent offerings direct to the boards.

Churches Repaired—Gresham church has been repaired and a basement completed, giving facilities for larger social work in this rural church.—Thayer congregation has raised money to paint its church and put a basement under the building. The manse has been repaired. The new pastor of these two churches is Rev. A. S. Hutchison.

Brief Items—Thomas K. Hunter, D. D., recently moderator of the Synod of Idaho, has taken charge of the federated churches at Palmyra.—Westminster church, University place, is prospering under the leadership of Rev. Andrew I. Keener, who also has under his care the newly organized church of Arbor, where he conducts services Sabbath afternoons.—The congregation of First church, Wahoo, has recently completed a new manse. On a recent evening the people gathered there and indulged in a housewarming.

HAPPENINGS IN VARIOUS STATES

California—Church people of Chico, Cal., raised $10,000 in three weeks to pay off the debt which has been on the building for some time.

Florida—Dr. Silas Cooke was installed pastor of Auburndale church Oct. 29, when the sermon was preached by Dr. E. C. MacLean.

Missouri—The women of synod have united their home and foreign missionary interests in one organization with Mrs. G. P. Baity of Kansas City as president.

Maryland—A card listing twenty-two opportunities for service was distributed at First church, Baltimore, at the beginning of the fall work. Members were asked to indicate the departments of work in which they would like to assist.

Montana—The new church at Great Falls is nearing completion. It will be one of the finest Protestant church buildings in the state. Rev. C. E. Schaible of Bushnell, Ill., will officiate at the dedication in December. Ezra P. Giboney, D. D., is pastor.

Indiana—Prison Sunday was observed in Fort Wayne First church by an address by the chaplain of the state penitentiary.—Dr. Charles Little of Wabash recently celebrated the close of his forty-first year as pastor. Special music and addresses marked the day.—Rockville recently celebrated its eightieth anniversary. Dr. Charles Little of Wabash spoke.

Tennessee—Evansville church dedicated a new house of worship Oct. 26. C. A. Duncan, D. D., of Harriman preached the sermon. The dedicatory services were followed by ten days of special evangelistic meetings by Rev. A. J. Coile of Knoxville.—Ocoee church, Chattanooga Presbytery, under the leadership of Rev. J. M. Wooten held a country life institute recently. Educational interests,

Sunday school work, home missions, evangelism in the country church and other subjects were discussed.

North Dakota—Committees on comity of the Presbyterians and Methodists are expected to meet soon to arrange differences which have developed concerning the manner of conducting services of the two denominations. The Methodists urge an interdenominational exchange plan in place of federation. The Presbyterians are ready to federate in small overchurched communities.

Wisconsin—Charles M. Sheldon, D. D., author of "In His Steps," has just completed a three weeks' tour in Wisconsin churches in the interest largely of Christian education. His first address was before synod at Carroll College and the last at Baraboo. His addresses have been most helpful, exalting the use of the Bible and stimulating the support of our synodical college. Everywhere well filled churches greeted the speaker.

Washington—Glenwood church was revived during the summer by the preaching of Rev. J. A. McVeigh. The people joined with Laurel church ten miles away to call a regular pastor.—Rev. C. E. Botts within a year built one church and renovated another. He was pastor at Zillah, where a house of worship was built last spring. He later removed to Castle Rock and Toledo and canvassed the town for funds to paint and repair the Castle Rock church. He made the repairs himself.—Raymond church under Rev. Thomas M. Wilson has let the contract for a new building to cost $10,000.

Minnesota—Rushmore will dedicate a new church this month. The building is on the site of the old one and will cost over $6,000. The pastor, Rev. James Wray, is holding services in the town hall during its construction.—The Woodstock church has recently purchased a manse.—A most profitable series of Sunday school institutes was recently held at Mankato, Worthington, Bruertes, Round Lake, Reading, Lismore, Hardwick and Pipestone. Rev. Gerritt Verkuyl, Ph. D., was in charge.—Worthington has a home department of sixty-four members which supports a Bible woman in China.

Iowa—A Presbyterian church was organized at Bettendorf Nov. 7 by a committee of Iowa City Presbytery. In the heart of a large industrial center, this church stands as the only Protestant organization. Sabbath school held in a dance hall has been struggling against great odds. A building lot has already been paid for and a creditable sum for the building has also been secured. Rev. J. Gilmore Smith, pastor of Mount Ida church, Davenport, has been doing much to make the organization and building of this church a realized fact. Rev. L. E. Koenig, Sabbath school missionary, has been spending some time assisting in securing funds.

MINISTERIAL OBITUARY

Rev. William Thomson, 82 years old, died at Easton, Pa., Nov. 12. He retired a few years ago after serving as pastor of the church at Stewartsville, N. J., for thirty-three years. Prior to that he had charges at Blossburg, Tamaqua and Duncannon and organized the first church in Mahanoy City. He graduated from the University of Pennsylvania in 1854.

Rev. James E. Anderson of Nichols, N. J., was killed in a railway wreck during the recent storm in western New York. Mr. Anderson formerly preached at LeRoy, N. Y., and while on the way to that place for a visit Nov. 10 the coach in which he was seated left the track, throwing him through a window and crushing him to death against the side of a cut through which the train was passing.

INVITE EVERYONE TO CHURCH

ILLINOIS — Attendance at every Protestant church in Joliet was doubled Nov. 9 as the result of a campaign to get everyone to go to some church. Ministers are confident the permanent benefits will be large.

Have Remodelel Church—Dedication of the remodeled church at Niota will take place Dec. 7. Repairs costing $5,000 have been made. Rev. D. W. Morgan is pastor.

New Peoria Pastor—The installation of Rev. Daniel E. Williamson as pastor of First church, Peoria, occurred Nov. 7. Among the ministers taking part were W. M. Elliott, Clinton J. Greene, Dr. A. N. Little, Dr. W. H. Pumphrey, A. G. Parker, James Benson and Alexander Lewis.

Northfield Schools' Big Work

Although Northfield Seminary and Mount Hermon Boys' school opened with 1,200 pupils, as many or perhaps more were turned away this fall on account of lack of facilities to care for them. The schools are a continuation of the work established by D. L. Moody and only half the cost of tuition is paid by the students themselves. There are now enrolled representatives of thirty-five nationalities, of all creeds and religious belief.

The equipment has grown more rapidly than the endowment, so that an annual deficit of $120,000 must be raised. This is occasioned by the half payment. The responsibility for the deficit was assumed by the founder. Today it is raised by public appeal.

There are a great many men and women today who feel it a great pleasure and privilege to forward, by the giving of their means, the great work that Mr. Moody started. Yearly there are gifts that amount to a good deal, but it is in the multiplicity of the smaller gifts that the safety of the school lies. Gifts from $1 to $5 are gratefully appreciated and those friends who lend their money and sympathy to this great work are sending forward the cause of Christian education in a far-reaching and certain way.

Revell's New Books—At All Booksellers

WAYNE WHIPPLE

The Story-Life of the Son of Man

Nearly a thousand stories from sacred and secular sources woven into a continuous and complete chronicle of the life of the Saviour. Story by story, the author has built up from the best that has been written, mosaic like, a vivid and attractive narrative of the life of lives. Mr. Whipple's life stories of Washington and Lincoln in the same unique form, have both been conspicuously successful books. Illustrated, net $2.50.

G. CAMPBELL MORGAN, D. D.

The Teaching of Christ

A Companion Volume to "The Crises of the Christ." "One does not read far before he is amazed at the clear and logical grasp Dr. Morgan has upon divine truths. Here is a work that may profitably occupy a prominent place in the minister's library."—Augsburg Teacher. Net $1.50

PATTERSON DU BOIS

The Practice of Salvation

Trailing a Word to a World Ideal

Mr. Du Bois, who is so well known to Bible teachers and students as the author of "The Point of Contact in Teaching," and "The Natural Way in Moral Training," in this, his latest volume, interprets salvation in the terms of the new psychology. Net $1.00

S. D. GORDON

Quiet Talks on Following the Christ

The latest volume of "Quiet Talks" radiates strength and courage for the Christian life. Of all Mr. Gordon's books there is none that grips the heart with more impelling force, bringing the reader and the truth face to face. Net 75 cents

CAROLINE ABBOT STANLEY

The Keeper of the Vineyard

A Tale of the Ozarks

This story of "a return to nature," like the author's "Master of the Oaks," pulsates with real life. The scene lies in the Missouri Ozarks, a melting pot wherein those who seek the solace of nature and a living from the soil fuse their lives with the natives of the Hills in the common quest for liberty and education, love and life. Illustrated, net $1.25

CLARA E. LAUGHLIN

The Work-A-Day Girl

A Study of Present-Day Conditions

Few writers today have given more serious and sympathetic consideration to the difficulties which beset the American working girl. The book is frank and outspoken, but not too much so, for there is need of plain talk on a matter so vital to our social welfare. Illustrated, net $1.50

EDWARD A. STEINER

The Parable of the Cherries

A call to a larger brotherhood by one who has devoted half a lifetime to informing and softening our thoughts toward the stranger within our gates. Boards, net 50 cents

MARTHA S. GIELOW

Uncle Sam

A Story of the Mountaineers

The dramatic quality of this original little story of the southern mountain people grips the reader and makes an irresistible appeal to his emotions. The author is widely known as a skillful and realistic interpreter of southern life thro' her readings and her previously published works, "Old Andy, the Moonshiner," "Mammy's Reminiscences," etc. Illus., net 50 cents

HUGH BLACK, M.A.

Author of "Friendship," etc.

Happiness

"Only those who are constitutionally pessimistic and temperamentally incapable of optimism can fail to find something good in this."—Minneapolis Journal. Pocket Edition. Gilt top, net $1.00

MALCOLM JAMES McLEOD, D.D.

Letters to Edward

The letters which make up this volume let the reader into the heart life of one of America's most popular preachers. Dr. McLeod has visualized the present-day world in which a metropolitan pastor moves, in a delightfully realistic way. His letters are human and appealing. Net $1.00

BELLE M. BRAIN

Love Stories of Great Missionaries

Miss Brain has made a distinct place for herself in missionary literature. She is pre-eminently a story-teller, knowing well how to invest her subject with charm and interest. In these love stories of the world's great missionaries she is at her best. Illustrated, net 50 cents

JULIA H. JOHNSTON

Fifty Missionary Heroes Every Boy and Girl Should Know

The author of that popular Mission Study Text Book, INDIAN AND SPANISH NEIGHBORS, has supplied a real need in this volume for Junior readers and leaders. Miss Johnston gives living portraits of a large number of missionary heroes well adapted to interest and inspire young people. Illus., net $1.00

The WAY of AMBITION

By ROBERT HICHENS, Author of "The Garden of Allah,"

A new sort of Hichens novel—pleasing and idealistic as well as dramatic and strong. A y composer cares for nothing but his art. His wife struggles for his outward success. The intens velopments in London and New York, and in the beautiful "Garden of Allah" country sound the places in emotion and character, and make a novel of fine significance. "We cannot fail to be moved to be impressed by it, to profit by it."—Boston Transcript. "One of the very best novels of recent years."—N. Y. Hera

THE HEART of the DESERT

By HONORÉ WILLSIE

The warm fascination of the empty desert silences — the health-giving beauty of the wild Arizona solitudes — Mrs. Willsie makes us feel these through and through. "The tale abounds in stirring, dramatic episodes," says the Philadelphia North American. "But the profound influence of the vast wilderness is its real theme." It makes a woman out of a complicated overcivilized girl of the city.

Mrs. Willsie wrote this novel in the midst of the desert she describes. It is a wonderful love story — in a wonderful setting.

MAUD LINDSAY

FOR THE YOUNGEST READERS

A STORY GARDEN (for Little Children)

By MAUD LINDSAY

Author of "Mother Stories" and "More Mother Stories." With introduction by Emilie Poulsson. Profusely illustrated by F. Liley Young.
Net, $1.00. Postpaid, $1.10.

The stories in A STORY GARDEN are addressed to the very youngest readers, and unlike many "simple" stories, which are merely pretty little nothings, Miss Lindsay's have point and truth that the young child can understand.

They are by far the best literary product (of their kind) that can be traced to the kindergarten or to the new understanding of childhood that marks our time. TRUST THEM. USE THEM. They will give joy, refine the taste, enrich the imagination, and gently impel the child toward the True, the Beautiful, and the Good.—FROM INTRODUCTION BY EMILIE POULSSON.

Around the Shop

Everybody in the Presbyterian Church ought to be proud of that bright paper Forward, which demonstrates every week that good reading matter can be made interesting. Here is a bit of wisdom that does credit to Forward's editorial judgment:

> "Every trade has its 'trade journals,' and the man who does not read his own trade journal is not a far-seeing business man or even much of a business man at all. So the Christian who does not read a religious paper regularly is likely to be a pretty poor Christian, not informed upon the progress of Christ's kingdom today."

The purpose of a trade journal is to broaden the horizon of the man who reads it—to get him to see beyond his own little corner. The right kind of religious newspaper has the same object in view and has a distinct appeal to those who are not self-centered but who see their work, small though it may be, in its relation to the big tasks before the whole church.

Some clever Methodist has recorded a conversation that the Around-the-Shop Man calmly adapts to his use. You will have to imagine the personæ and scenery:

"Do you take a religious paper?"

"No. Haven't time to read. Take more papers now than I can read."

"Know much about the Presbyterian Church?"

"Oh, yes. We have a little paper that tells us all about what we have done during the last month."

"When and where is our next General Assembly to meet?"

"Don't know."

"What is our Foreign Mission Board doing now?"

"Don't know."

"In what countries does it do its work?"

"Don't know."

"What sort of work does our Home Mission Board do?"

"Don't know."

"Where is our home missionary work most needed?"

"Don't know."

"What are the boards, anyway?"

"Well—er—I—I can't just define them. We give them a collection once a month."

"Don't know."

"Is the General Assembly or the presbytery the higher body?"

"Don't know."

"Is our cause making much progress at present?"

The Services of Trained Women

AMONG THE FOREIGN-SPEAKING PEOPLE OF AMERICA

A GREAT NEED OF THE DAY

THE SCHAUFFLER MISSIONARY TRAINING SCHOOL, Cleveland, Ohio, Incorporated (not for profit) under the laws of Ohio, was founded for this purpose in 1886, by H. A. Schauffler.

It has a strong local board of Trustees under a corporation of twenty-five representative men from all parts of the United States.

1. It is the pioneer school of its kind.
2. It aims to help the Christian Church in the most serious need and most delicate task.
3. It prepares young women for the newly developed missionary work in our congested cities.
4. It makes possible by its cosmopolitan character, a kind of training given nowhere else.
5. It affords opportunity for self-help that aids self-development and leads to nobility of character.
6. It combines in an unusual degree vigorous class-room discipline, True Spiritual Culture, a Refined Home Life, with Practical Training which teaches how to do by doing, how to help by helping, how to serve by serving.

$100,000

The Cry of the Jungle

"THE EARTH IS GOD'S; MAN'S A THIEF."

Dan Crawford, African missionary, tells stories of the jungle that make one's flesh creep.

But nothing else equals for harrowing horror his tale of the wild woman whom one day, in the depths of a supposedly uninhabited forest, he discovered leaping from branch to branch like an ape.

The uncanny recital grows still more distressingly dramatic as Crawford tells how he sought to gain the attention of the lunatic creature, and reestablish, if he could, in her wrecked brain the desire for fellowship with human kind.

But nothing he could do could overcome the tremulous dread with which she retreated farther and farther from even the gentlest step with which the missionary approached her. And when he spoke to her soothingly in the human tongue to which she had been born, not the slightest sign of understanding crossed the poor imbecile's face.

Only the nervous, inarticulate chatter which the pitiful hermit had learned from monkey neighbors in her treetops answered the missionary calls—except that now and again, when her fright subsided a little, the uncanny creature's voice would rise to a weird shriek resounding through the forest with one horrible and dismaying cry—the sole remnant of human speech which had survived in her ruined brain.

And the missionary understood and translated the cry:

Crawford's grewsome discovery was not new to the natives of that region. They were aware of the demoniac and could tell the white man her history. Some brutish sinner of her tribe had dishonored her, and driven mad by suffering and disgrace, she fled from the injustice of humanity to the jungle's merciful oblivion.

Yet two ideas, ineffaceable memorials of her soul-breaking experience, still lingered amid the fragments of this shattered personality—just two ideas, hate of men and (wonder of all wonders!) faith in God.

Dan Crawford has brought back from the long grass and the labyrinthine bush of Africa no tidings more surprising than this—that in the most primitive haunts of savagery, God has not left himself without witness, but has so spoken to native hearts that nowhere do the black men and women doubt the existence of the Creator.

So even this black woman shrieking madly in the treetops was one who in girlhood had learned from the wisdom of her tribe that there is a God who made the world for the welfare of his creatures.

And that amid her bestial darkness, dimly recalling the teaching of her childish days, she still held to as "one fixed stake" to which even a maniac spirit might cling. Besides that, she knew nothing more than that man, wicked, ruthless, took from her the innocent happiness God meant her to have.

Hence that wail which made the forest shudder:

Why does a shudder run along the nerves of the listening American? Is it not a tale of far-away Africa—far, far indeed, from this stable civilization which many generations have founded deep and builded high until it cannot be shaken?

And yet somehow the unearthly wail of the jungle's madwoman returns hauntingly to echo itself in an American brain. Can it be a parable of warning after all?

Could it be that America's gorgeous palaces and broad highways might turn jungle in some mad crisis, and hideous savagery, wild with hate and pain, roam through them shouting:

"The earth is God's; man's a thief."

"Not unless humanity took leave of its senses," you say severely. Ah, but there's the very rub of it. What if the hosts of men who today feel the grind of things and wonder why life is so bitter, should some day take leave of their senses?

The devil of lunacy asks no better atmosphere in which to work his mischief than an air of long and dumb brooding over pains and deprivations for which the sufferers see no blame in themselves.

And if all the while through the darkness of such despair there glows the dull red fire of grim faith that God did not mean it so, the kindling of a lurid conflagration may all too easily follow.

What could the comfortable American do if all the muttering unrest he knows of, once took fire from the explosive mixture of faith in God and unfaith in mankind!

Insist, if you will, that such a thing could not be unless the mass of men went lunatic. But that only means that it is time for men rational and just to bestir themselves, while reason yet avails, to amend the conditions on which lunacy could feed.

There was a horror of wicknedness done to that miserable African woman before she fled raving to the forests. Whoever had forestalled that injustice would have forestalled her maniac fury.

And whoever speaks and serves now in America for righteousness toward the weak and sympathy toward the unhappy, is fortifying that social sanity in which alone the people can dwell unafraid of lunatic outbreaks.

Perhaps the danger is not so very near. Perhaps it is nearer than some men think. But anyhow it is time to do justice.

The faith in God let us hasten to confirm. But unfaith in man—away with it quickly; it is dynamite!

The church has not committed these injustices which oppressed men cry out against. They are mainly the fault of irreligious and sodden money grabbers who have never listened to the church's counsels.

But like its Lord, the church must bear vicariously the sins of the many.

It ought to be early and eager therefore in trying to make restitution to the masses of the dispossessed and encumbered—restitution for the wrongs done by that part of mankind who really have stolen from the helpless the good things the Lord intends for all.

Restitution particularly of human encouragement and helpful brotherhood the church can certainly bring to the poor, worn and depressed.

For it is true that "the earth is Jehovah's and the fullness thereof." Moreover, "the earth hath he given to the children of men."

Which also the church must proclaim as part of the good tidings of Him who was brother of the lowly and awful reprover of the haughty and the hateful.

The World

East Indian Laborers Riot in South Africa

The color line is causing serious trouble in Natal and the Transvaal, South Africa. Over 100,000 laborers of East Indian blood stopped work as a protest against their treatment by the whites and some rioting and burning of sugar plantations occurred. For the most part the general strike took the form of passive resistance, against which Western methods could make no headway. British accounts tell how the East Indian laborer, without the suggestion of a labor union, when he has done what he considers enough, ceases work. If urged to continue he declines. If told he will lose his job he makes no objection. The threat of starvation, suffering or death seems to have no terrors for him. He has no greed of possession nor material ambition.

As these Asiatics do practically all the menial labor in Natal on farms, plantations, railroads and mines and are also mechanics and domestics, the situation proved embarrassing to the "higher" races. Natal needs their labor but refuses them full citizenship. Groups of jabbering Orientals journeyed from one outlying estate to another, spreading terror among the scattered white residents and necessitating the calling out of the troops. Some 2,000 coolies who attempted to cross the border from the Transvaal to Natal were arrested for violating a white man's law prohibiting the emigration of Asiatic laborers from one state to another of the South African Union. The Asiatics also refused to pay a $15 poll tax.

Nearly every British colony has laws against this class of immigrants from India, yet their cheap labor has proved an attractive bait to large employers, and until the coolies developed "class consciousness" all went well. An official commission composed of members of the British Indian government and an East Indian of industrial experience is now investigating the crown colonies where indentured immigration is permitted. On a larger scale the problem is similar to the racial discrimination question faced by the United States and Japan in California.

Great Britain Troubled by Larkinism

Having survived the perils of Pankhurstism, Great Britain is now threatened by Larkinism. Neither one of these scourges is to be lightly regarded. Mrs. Pankhurst and her militant brood have at least temporarily exhausted their ingenuity, but James Larkin and his followers are fresh for the fight. Larkin's quarrel is against capitalism and established institutions. He is for a general overturning of the relations between employers and employees, and in his warfare he has lately been encouraged by the notorious William D. Haywood of the Industrial Workers of the World—the "Big Bill" of Idaho, Colorado, Lawrence and New Jersey fame. Larkin himself also had American experience before he came to inflame the Dublin strike situation. In Dublin the battle has been of the bitterest kind, and as a sort of climax Larkin was arrested and sentenced to seven months' imprisonment for "sedition." Larkin's imprisonment aroused the more radical of the government's supporters to fury, and in the course of a few days he was released as an act of official clemency.

Miss Violet Asquith, daughter of Premier Asquith, who has a reputation as a public speaker and a "stateswoman," explained, in a speech she made at a Liberal gathering, why Larkin was freed. "Sedition," she remarked, "is a rather mediæval offense—especially now that Sir Edward Carson (of Ulster) has shorn it of every shred of glamour." The politicians say it is obvious that the Dublin agitator was let out because the Liberals lost votes in two recent special elections. In any event Larkin failed to evince any gratitude for his freedom, but hastened to England "to raise the fiery cross."

Larkin's first public meeting in London last week drew a great crowd, including a large body of medical students who undertook to break up the meeting. His program of a general strike in sympathy with the Dublin contestants was postponed for three weeks by the parliamentary committee of the trades union congress, much to the disgust of his aggressive adherents.

Work Against Liquor in Germany and France

A "strike" against alcohol was proposed at a meeting of Socialists in Berlin last week. According to a Chicago newspaper correspondent the faction of the Socialists which believes in general strikes wants to try that sort of weapon against the liquor traffic. The argument was advanced that alcohol is the strongest chain "by which the proletariat is kept in bondage." If the masses want to be free they must keep clear heads. By way of statistical reenforcement it was shown that Germany spends twice as much on alcoholism as on the burden of militarism. The various ramifications and vested interests of the liquor traffic, it was asserted, help capitalism "to hold the upper hand."

In France the women of the nation have begun to take a part in the anti-liquor crusade. Many thousands of them joined in a petition to the chamber of deputies, which was presented last week, asking for a law to limit the number of bars and other places for the sale of spirits. The movement is directed specifically against distilled liquors and not against beer or wine. Since 1900 the number of establishments selling spirits is reported to have increased from 435,000 to 479,000, and the consumption of alcoholic liquors is also increasing in spite of a heavy tax. Deputy Siegfried, a former minister of commerce, states that there is now one bar for every 82 inhabitants in France—an appallingly low figure. A measure similar to the one asked for by the women would limit the number of bars to one for each 200 persons.

Mexico Torn Between Huerta and Carranza

The Mexican kaleidoscope has again made several turns, but the week ended with Dictator Huerta in power at Mexico City, with General Carranza and the constitutionalists, assisted by the ferocious General Villa, in control of the northern half of the country. The Mexican congress, of a temper and complexion agreeable to the dictator, met and received from him a message containing an explanation of why he had clapped the old congress into jail, followed by a profession of renewed respect for the constitution and talk about placing "national dignity above all base interests of the moment." Meanwhile conditions at the Mexican capital grow more unsettled.

William Bayard Hale, President Wilson's special investigator, broke off his conference with the northern rebels. There was one rumor that Mr. Hale had refused to present official credentials, but a more credible report was that General Carranza had been asked if he would abide by the accepted rules of civilized warfare in case the United States permitted him to import firearms. This Carranza could not promise because of his inability to regulate the soldier-brigands who fight under his banner.

Says Uncle Sam Should Control Water Powers

The National Conservation Congress at its annual convention in Washington last week devoted special attention to the question of the federal control of water powers, and after a sharp contest adopted a platform of principles opposing monopolistic private ownership. Among the leading champions of federal or public control as opposed to state and private rights were Gifford Pinchot, chief forester under President Roosevelt; Henry L. Stimson, formerly secretary of war; Walter L. Fisher and James R. Garfield, formerly secretaries of the interior department; and Joseph M. Teal of Oregon. Mr. Pinchot was accused of receding from the ground he had once taken, but he declared that if the charge were true it in no way disconcerted him.

Another organization deeply interested in the development of the nation's national resources will also meet in Washington in a few days—the National Rivers and Harbors Congress. The congress will take up the whole subject of Mississippi river improvement and the prevention of such floods as devastated the Ohio river valley last spring. There is a difference of opinion between United States Senators Ransdell of Louisiana and Newlands of Nevada. The senators are both Democrats and are regarded as men of high caliber, but they disagree radically as to the governmental methods to be employed to control the floods and to regulate the flow of water in navigable streams. Senator Newlands's plan would provide for flood prevention and protection by means of huge reservoirs for water storage purposes and the protection of watersheds. The Newlands plan is set forth in a bill in Congress which would create a board of river regulation on broad lines at an estimated expense of $50,000,000 a year for ten years. Senator Ransdell, who is said to represent the view of the people of the lower Mississippi sections, believes that the main, if not the chief reliance, should be placed on levees and that immediate results can thus be obtained.

Development of an inland waterway route along the Atlantic coast, part of which has already become an accomplished fact, was urged at the convention of the Atlantic Deeper Waterways Association at Jacksonville, Florida, last week. Congressman J. Hampton Moore of Pennsylvania, president of the association, emphasized the need of an inner trade route along the coast by means of which destructive storms would be avoided and the transportation of commodities greatly facilitated. Mr. Moore argued that this would have a most important influence in reducing the cost of living and would affect at least 40 per cent of the population of the United States and would therefore be a proper recipient for congressional appropriations.

"City Manager" Plan Indorsed at Convention

Increasing attention is being given to urban problems, new and old, as cities increase in number and size. One of the organizations long at work on the task is the National Municipal League, which held its annual convention a few days ago in Toronto. The league has launched a propaganda described as "the application of knowledge to the service of communities"—the substituting of efficient management for inefficient, and public spirit for indifference to the community welfare.

A special committee appointed two and a half years ago to study the commission form of government for cities reported its finding that the best government could be obtained by a "city manager" hired by an elected commission, this expert manager to be chosen from anywhere in the country, without regard to politics, and to be subject to removal by the commissioners. The remaining city employees would be appointed by the manager under adequate civil service laws. Fewer than ten cities—Dayton and Springfield, Ohio, being the most important—have as yet applied the manager plan, whereas 300 are living under the commission form of government, but the manager-commission idea was considered by the students of municipal affairs at Toronto as a notable improvement over the original Galveston and Des Moines commission plans, which in turn have been found generally superior to the old-fashioned partisan mayor and council, the later often of unwieldy size. Administrative unity and harmony as well as the employment of expert service can thus be had.

William Dudley Foulke of Richmond, Indiana, was reelected president and C. R. Woodruff of Philadelphia secretary. New members were placed on the executive committee to represent the West and South.

Filipinos Pass Law Against Slavery; Mr. Taft Criticises

It is a remarkable fact that a part of the territory of the United States has just found it necessary to pass a law to suppress slavery. On November 15 the Philippine national assembly after a heated debate enacted a measure framed by Mr. Phipps, the insular auditor, reaffirming the old Spanish statutes and incorporating the American laws. The New York Tribune, for one, interprets the action as a confession that slavery has been in existence in the islands in spite of the denials of Delegate Quezon and other ardent advocates of "immediate independence."

Ex-President Taft spoke on the topic "Holding the Philippines" in Brooklyn last week, and reaffirmed his belief that the great majority of Filipinos will not be ready for self-government for another generation. He took exception to the present policy of the administration in granting more powers to the native politicians on the legislative commission. Mr. Taft also criticised the removal by the new governor general of experienced American bureau heads, and prophesied that when President Wilson "learned the truth" some of the steps now being taken would be retraced.

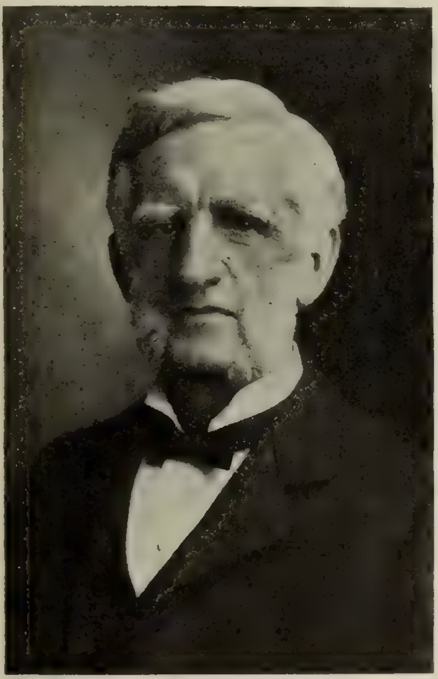
Another White House wedding took place this week when President Wilson's daughter Jessie was married to Francis B. Sayre. Mr. Sayre is a young lawyer and has been employed in the New York district attorney's office, but will hereafter act as assistant to the president of Williams College.

A Valiant Captain of the Lord's Host

THE CONTINENT is gratified today with the reflection that it has not waited until his death to pay tribute to the brilliant talents which Dr. Herrick Johnson so powerfully and whole-heartedly devoted to the religious progress of his generation. What is said here, therefore, accompanying the record of his decease at his home in Philadelphia on Thursday, November 20, can only be reaffirmation and reemphasis of previous estimates of his altogether exceptional service in the Presbyterian Church. It was a service compounded of half a dozen varied elements, whereof any one would have been enough to secure his name permanent remembrance in the Christian annals of America.



Herrick Johnson, D. D.

There was something leonine in Dr. Johnson, despite his slender and nervous figure, and that daring and imperious quality had endued him with the magic of leadership from his youth up. Of that leaderly power he gave a faithful steward's good account by helping to cement during his young manhood the then recent conjunction of Old and New School Presbyterians, by forcing on the General Assembly the necessity for organizing a College Board to advance Christian education, by contributing to the development of McCormick Theological Seminary, by calming the hysteria of fear which threatened to obsess the church at the period of the Briggs trials, and perhaps above all else, by his persistent and skillful labors to create among Presbyterians the public sentiment that made possible the liberating revision of the Westminster Confession in 1903. It is full measure for a long life which is thus recounted in barest outline, and even this enumeration does not include the incalculable influence of his twenty-five years of teaching in McCormick Seminary. As professor of homiletics there he imparted to hundreds of the ablest men in the contemporary Presbyterian ministry his own thrilling joy, and something at least of his own entrancing power, in the preaching of the gospel of Jesus Christ.

To those, however, who were in any degree privileged to enjoy Dr. Johnson's personal friendship, the memory of his monumental public service will be subordinated to the tenderer memory of the "sweetness and light" of his private life. With all his strength and determination, it was yet a rarely gentle soul that dwelt in his bosom. In public and in private his wholesomeness was equal, and a stainless shield is the bright ornament of the earthly armor he has just laid off. Being granted in God's providence an ample span of duty and experience here, he is not to be mourned as he passes to his heavenly recompense; not sorrow but thanksgiving for him is the perfume of the flowers on his bier.

Dr. Herrick Johnson was born in Kaughnewagh, New York, September 22, 1832. Graduating from Hamilton College and Auburn Seminary he was ordained to the ministry in 1860. Almost immediately he leaped into the reputation of a preacher of the first rank for eloquence, charm and force. Successively he was popular in the pulpits of his first charge in Troy, New York; the Third church of Pittsburg, and First church of Philadelphia. Then followed a period of six years as professor of homiletics in his home seminary at Auburn. Thence in 1880 he was drawn to Chicago to serve as pastor of Fourth church with incidental teaching duties in McCormick Seminary. Shortly the teaching took precedence of the pastoral work, and he launched out fully on his greatest lifework in connection with that institution. At the beginning of this period he was elected moderator of General Assembly in Springfield, Illinois, May, 1882.

In 1905 the advance of age induced Dr. Johnson to retire from active duties. In 1907 he lost his wife, whom as Miss Catherine Hardenbergh he married in Auburn in 1860. In 1910 he wedded Miss Duncan of Louisville. Interment was at Auburn Sunday.

Unmustered Forces

IT IS GENERALLY UNDERSTOOD now that the greatest blunder at Waterloo was when Marshal Ney was calling for reenforcements and declaring he could not hold his position without them. There were actually at his disposal troops which he had not called into action. Napoleon supposed he was using them. Ney had forgotten them. They were called up too late to be of help, and that failure contributed to the defeat.

Of course no such single incident as this would explain the whole scene at Waterloo. Victor Hugo gathers it up in the striking phrase, "Napoleon bothered God." He means that the cup of Napoleon's iniquity was full; that he was no longer a help but would have been a hindrance. Still God works through human means, even including human failures, and it is not too much to say that Ney's failure to muster his full force was a large element in the outcome.

The incident is a parable of conditions widely prevalent. The church has a vast number of unmustered forces. Some forces have been ordered forward, but have not moved. Pastors are sometimes sadly conscious of it. Their forces are not mutinous; they are only politely indifferent. The story is told of a deaf woman to whom someone was shouting, who turned to her daughter to ask, "Why is this man so red in the face?" Her daughter replied, "He is trying to tell you something." "Well, he needn't shout so loud," said the old lady, "I am not listening to a word he says." There are a good many pastors red in the face from trying to tell people things to which they are not listening at all. They are deaf on that side.

Some pastors, to be sure, are only calling out general orders; telling the troopers to move forward without having any definite idea where they are to go nor what they are to do. They want them to fire, but they have no general plan of campaign that suggests the direction in which they should aim. That is not true of all pastors, however. Some have seen plainly enough what needs to be done; have made duty specific enough so that no one can miss it. They have found themselves not really leaders at all. Instead of following, the soldiers have stopped to discuss whether they believe in that way of doing it or not.

But disheartenment is not permissible. A pastor has simply to find the work and persistently challenge the workers. There is no value in general orders that everybody do something. When the pastor says, "Get to work! Get to work!" workers are sure to reply, "Where?" "At what?" "How?" A pastor must be ready at once to answer. If the members then are not ready there is nothing for him but to keep at his challenge persistently.

A careful search of most churches would reveal, however, that there are unmustered forces which have never been called upon. Certainly it is true in the church at large. We rejoice in the assurance which our leaders are giving us that the continual cry for more ministers is being answered, and our seminaries are increasing their enrollment. It would be a pity, however, if this should keep us from calling out certain forces which we have had all the time. The Presbyterian Church is not half using its laity.

We have made almost a fetish of the presence of ordained ministers. If there is not a pastor we take it for granted that of course there will be no marked growth in the church. There may be two or three elders and as many deacons and Sunday school teachers, besides godly women not a few, but we excuse all these and explain that the people could not have services since there was no minister. As a matter of fact there is no reason why our laymen should not go into the pulpit and conduct services, read sermons or say what is in their hearts to say.

The Presbyterian Church made provision a few years ago for an order of local evangelists. They were to be pious men who had some gifts of speech, but who were not ready or might never be ready to become ordained ministers. What have we done with that great opportunity? We have done nothing at all with it. Nine of our synods report no local evangelists. Only five have over ten each, and one of these is the Philippines, where our wise missionaries are making large use of the plan. All told we have in the church 268 local evangelists, 100 of them being in the Philippines.

On the other hand we have over 40,000 elders and nearly 15,000 deacons. That great force alone ought to have furnished us long ago hundreds of local evangelists. Certainly there is nothing in the principles of the Presbyterian Church which keeps us from using these men to render service. Augustus Toplady, who wrote the leading hymn in the English language, was not converted in a church nor under the preaching of an ordained minister.

It has been a wise policy of some pastors to develop preaching places in their neighborhoods where promising young men could be sent to talk their religion. Such a plan puts an impetus into the work which keeps it going when the pastor drops out. For the work of preaching, our laymen are unmustered forces. We are talking of the great need there is for workers; for men to proclaim the gospel. Are they not here waiting to be set into action?

The Doctrine of Atonement in Practice

For people who like their theology brought down to date there is an illuminative illustration in the act of almost incredible self-sacrifice performed by the owner of the clothing factory in Binghamton, New York, where so many working girls lost their lives when the building was destroyed by fire a few months ago. The proprietor was not held responsible for this horrible calamity, but he took no excuse to himself from that fact. A real Christian without denial, he literally bore the sorrows of all those who had been injured or bereaved by the disaster, and could content himself with nothing less than the utmost sacrifice of which he was capable for the sufferers. In consequence, he converted his whole fortune into cash and gave every penny to be distributed among the disabled and the families of the dead. The action is so extraordinary that it has seemed to the public all but unbelievable. But it is extraordinary only because it so beautifully imitates the marvel of Christ's atonement for men. Christ was not responsible for the grief and sin of the world, but his love for the grief-stricken and the sinning made it impossible for him to be satisfied until he had "emptied himself" in their behalf. And even as there can be, after such an "emptying," no more room for hatred and ill-will between this Binghamton man and his former employees—just as they are now "at one"—so man and God are "at one" because Christ likewise sacrificed everything. Is not this the divine wonder of the atonement made visible and near, by Christ's grace, on a human projection?

"Too Busy to Study the Bible"

From a lecture in which Professor Hugh Black had strongly praised expository preaching, two experienced ministers came away agreeing between themselves that that sort of preaching was impossible for them. The reason was that they were too busy to study the Bible enough for it.

We wonder if that is the real reason why American preachers so seldom pursue the expository method which in English and Scotch pulpits is almost universal. If it is, then there is no mystery about loss of power in preaching on this side the Atlantic. The question involved here is something very much more serious than homiletic method. No matter what the method, power in preaching is beyond any man or set of men too busy for the Bible. The demands of a modern pastorate are, to be sure, enormously imperious, but a man with grace sufficient for the ministry ought to be strong enough to resist any demands that forbid thorough and continuous study of his Guidebook.

Nothing Amiss with Our Consistency Here

The Continent could easily have foretold the rejoinder which The Herald and Presbyter would make to our recent declaration that Scripture forbids Christians to appeal to the civil courts for settlement of misunderstandings with brethren in the church. The retort is, of course, that The Continent did not look this way at the litigation which was in the courts so long over the union of the Presbyterian and Cumberland Presbyterian Churches. But The Herald and Presbyter says this, just as we knew it would, because its habit of confusing things that are not alike is inveterate. The Continent's opinion of litigation between Christians is now just what it has been all the while through the unhappy period of legal conflict with the Cumberland anti-unionists—to wit, that such suits are wickedness on the part of those who institute them.

So far as The Continent knows, that wrong throughout this controversy was on the side of the Cumberland anti-union people, with perhaps one dubious exception—a circumstance wherein unionists instituted suit in order to bring under one single head a multitude of suits that the anti-unionists were threatening. This was in reality a strictly defensive act, yet The Continent has always regretted that the united church, even in such a condition, allowed itself to be put in the position of aggressor. And we believe that the men who initiated the action today participate in the same regret.

Whatever mistake may have been made in method, however, it has remained true that the Presbyterian Church in this conflict has been in court not to gain property or to vindicate its rights, but solely to shake itself loose from the intolerable notion that civil government may limit the church's liberty of action in its own ecclesiastical field. As far as property was concerned, suits of the anti-unionists might well have been allowed to go by default. But to have admitted for a moment that a civil court can exercise the power to invalidate acts which a church body undertakes in conformity with its own constitution was simply impossible. For the church to consent to that would be consenting to have its very breath choked out of it. The Presbyterian Church did not go to law against the anti-unionists, but when the anti-unionists did the unchristian thing of invoking the law against their brethren, no other course was possible than the outright and manly denial of any authority in the civil power to interfere with such questions. And that manly denial, unflinchingly maintained, has now been unmistakably conceded by the courts themselves.

—Hallam, the English historian, writing a hundred years ago, remarked that only those who knew nothing of the power of the papacy in the dark ages could be terrorized by it in the nineteenth century. "Those who know what Rome has once been," said he, "are best able to appreciate what she is. Those who have seen the thunderbolt in the hands of the Gregories and the Innocents will hardly be intimidated by the sallies of decrepitude—the impotent dart of Priam amid the crackling ruins of Troy." And the pope is far weaker today than in Hallam's time, for then he was still a temporal monarch. Of course, if all Protestants fell asleep, papacy might win the world yet. But Protestantism will not sleep. The Protestant spirit—the spirit of freedom—is the spirit of the age and must possess the future.

—The late Dr. McNiece of Salt Lake City was probably the only man of his generation who had been with efficient success a whole college faculty in himself. In the earlier days of the country not a few Presbyterian ministers successfully taught a complete college curriculum, but in these latter times it has been considered somewhat discreditable to attempt it. But Dr. McNiece at Salt Lake felt that he had to, and for a long time he gave instruction in all the subjects of a full classical course for the freshman and sophomore years. And that he was not doing slipshod work was fully attested when his sophomores came from Utah to colleges in the Central West and were there accepted as juniors without conditions.

—Talk about appropriate association of ideas—you surely can't beat this: The Baptists of New York City have moved their denominational headquarters into the Neptune building. That is every bit as good as one of these "mnemonic systems" that professors of memory schools teach their students. "Baptists—water—Neptune;" there's no missing it. Just think what a boon it will be to the Baptist country cousin coming to Manhattan; he will need to repeat the formula just once as he lands in the city, and then with all the confidence in the world he will step up to the nearest policeman and suavely request: "Tell me how to get to the Neptune building, please."

—Dr. Cummins, an Episcopal clergyman, writes: "The Protestant Episcopal Church is the only ecclesiastical organization on earth which does not make the acceptance of a given theology a condition of membership." Did you forget the Presbyterians, Brother Cummins? If the Presbyterian Church calls for "the acceptance of a given theology" as a condition of membership, we do not know where it is. It asks that men accept Jesus Christ as Saviour and Master, but it gives them no creed when they enter the church. That much at least the Protestant Episcopal Church still requires.

—There is a big Presbyterian Sunday school in a thriving American city—it wouldn't be quite generous to tell exactly where—whose successful and beloved superintendent today was sentenced to jail ten years ago on a criminal charge by a judge who now teaches one of the Bible classes of the school. "Jesus is able to save" in the twentieth century just as in any of the centuries gone before, and it is needless to say that both the judge and the Sunday school superintendent with whom he is so proud to cooperate believe the fact and give thanks for it.

—When the campaign for the anti-polygamy amendment to the federal constitution is fairly under swing, one of the interesting things to watch will be the turn which President Joseph F. Smith of the Mormon church may take toward the matter. Many will remember that in the spring of 1911 Smith said publicly in Salt Lake City that if an amendment on this subject were prepared for the constitution Mormons would support it. But that very precise student of Mormon wiles, Dr. T. C. Smith of Denver, calls The Continent's attention to the peculiar terms in which the Mormon president couched this statement. The quotation of his exact words sounds like a sentence shrewdly mapped out so it would be taken for something else than it meant. Among other queer phrases, there is one which speaks of Congress being granted authority to "regulate plural marriage." Did the old Mormon fox say "regulate" on purpose? Regulation involves legal recognition, and permission under certain circumstances, and of course Smith, a polygamist himself to this day, would like that immensely. But if he tries to stand there when the amendment is under discussion he will learn that regulation is not what the rest of the country is looking for. Nothing less than the most drastic prohibition will do.

—The first official church news bureau to be established in the United States has been set up at Nashville, Tennessee, by the joint action of the three foreign mission boards which have headquarters in that city—the Southern Methodist, the Southern Baptist and the Southern Presbyterian. The bureau will send out a weekly budget of missionary news to all the leading daily and weekly papers in nineteen cities, South and West. Indications encourage the belief that the material will be very widely used and will reach a vast majority of the 35,000,000 inhabitants of the territory covered. It is stated that the bureau will by no means confine its material to information concerning the three churches which support it, but will include significant developments in mission work of all denominations throughout the world.

—A Roman Catholic priest walking along the street with a volume under his arm written by one of the most noted of the "modernists," was challenged by a frank-spoken Protestant friend who said to him bluntly: "That is a book that you believe, but you don't dare say so." The priest smiled imperturbably and answered only: "When you join an army you have to do what the general says." Yet the pope imagines there is no modernism among his American following simply because all the American priests took the oath against modernist doctrines.

—Brick Church Life, which represents Brick Presbyterian church of Rochester, is now twenty years old, and entertains a strong suspicion that it is the oldest parish magazine in the country. And quite likely it is, for this class of periodical is not noted for longevity. However, if all the parish magazines were as good as Brick Church Life is, perhaps they would all live longer.

—It will be good news to those who are interested in Princeton University throughout the country that President Hibben and his faculty are following up vigorously last year's measures to discourage drinking among the students. Princeton has never been as bad as some universities, but with its traditions it ought to be better than any of the rest in this respect.

—People who complain of things hard to understand in religion would have less use for a religion in which everything was easy to understand. Even a child soon tires of a primer. The marvel of Christianity from an intellectual standpoint is its combination of a simplicity that a babe may begin in, along with a profundity that sages have never exhausted.

THE IMMIGRANT AND THE ROMAN CHURCH

BY NORMAN M. THOMAS

OUR PROTESTANT WORK among the immigrants has brought us face to face with a peculiarly difficult problem; namely, that of our relation to the Roman Catholic Church. It is a problem which we cannot escape and upon which light can come only through fair and Christian discussion by those who know something of the facts. Probably no man can speak with absolute assurance, but each may be able to make some contribution to this important theme. In this hope this article is written.

There are two general positions as regards our relation to the Roman Church. First, that of the extreme Protestants who believe, many of them doubtless sincerely, as did our fathers in the days of the reformation, that she is fundamentally anti-Christian and has to be fought with perhaps greater fervor than an avowed non-Christian religion because her dangers are more insidious. Some of those who hold these views have had bitter personal experience with the worst side of Catholicism, which may excuse such an attitude in them. But we cannot approve of it, and in the peculiarly virulent form in which it appears in certain current publications it is a danger to true Protestantism and contrary to the spirit of Christ.

The other position is very attractive in theory: "Let us work with the Catholics as with brethren, let us respect the long history of the church and the brave, self-sacrificing devotion of many of the priests. If we desire to help our immigrant brethren of the Catholic faith, let us do it through settlements and through social agencies, leaving the strictly religious teaching to the Catholic Church which claims them all. Above everything let us labor to the end that there be no dissensions or religious hatred aroused in this country of religious toleration."

Now, as a matter of fact, are we shut up to these extremes and do the facts warrant either one of them? To the writer they emphatically do not. We will begin by admitting that true Christians can be found in the Roman Catholic Church; that in many ways its influence over immigrants is beneficial and that it certainly numbers in its ranks priests who are true shepherds of the flock of God, and men and women who have in them the spirit of Christ. Moreover at the same time we shall humbly remember that we must temper our criticism by a vivid memory of the failings of the Protestant church. Our own churches have come far short of the Christian ideal. We have lost very largely our hold over the poor and the laboring classes, not without grave fault of our own. We have not known how to realize in life our glib Protestant gospel of brotherhood and we have within our ranks true descendants of those scribes and Pharisees whom Jesus denounced. Our lack of union and of the Christlike spirit makes our own ways seem far from perfect to the immigrant; and we are sometimes checked even in our denunciation of the character of many priests by the bitter memory of the moral failure of those who have received Protestant ordination and been sent to labor among foreign-speaking populations.

Yet though all these things must be said, it still remains true that we have a right to try to do a definite religious work even among those who are claimed as Catholics. In the first place, especially among the Italians, thousands of those who are called Catholics are such in name only. Let me illustrate this by conditions in my own community. We have a population of over 90,000 Italians with only three Roman Catholic churches serving them in their own language. Two of these have only basements built and the third confines its Italian services to the basement. The colony is honeycombed with agnostic and anarchistic groups whose views are not so much a result of philosophical thought as of intense reaction against the tyranny and sins of the church as they have known it in Italy. All through the district you will find prominently displayed the illustrated magazine L'Asino (The Ass), a bitter anticlerical paper. Conditions such as these are sufficient evidence that hundreds upon hundreds of those whom the Catholic Church claims almost never go to church, and the enthusiastic hearing which can be got by those who attack the church proves how weak is her hold over a large proportion of those whom she nominally enrolls. With multitudes just enough attention is paid to the church to provide, as it were, insurance against the risk of hell. Has the Protestant church no right to present a way of escape between Catholicism which we ourselves with our love of liberty could never accept and soul-killing agnosticism?

Crowds Waiting to Enter Church at Festival Time

But, you will ask, why can we not work side by side with the Roman Church in harmony? Certainly we ought to try to do it as far as truth will permit, but the great fact is that the Catholic Church will not allow it. It is essential to her dogma that she is the only church and she is compelled by her own theory to prefer nominal Catholics, even if they are bad men, to any kind of Protestants. Our work in a certain district in New York was bitterly denounced at a time when we had scrupulously refrained from an attack upon Roman Catholicism. Our only sin was that we were working at all among the Italians and others claimed by the church but really without religion.

Moreover, there is another argument for Protestant work which is sometimes forgotten, and that is the leavening influence of such work in a community. It is almost a truism that the Roman Church is at its best where there is a strong Protestant influence, as in America and Great Britain, in contrast to the Latin countries. The situation is not otherwise in our foreign-speaking colonies. One of the best results of Protestant work is the higher type of priest and the moral instruction that the Roman Church feels forced to put in. The church is always and everywhere sufficiently zealous in all matters pertaining to her ecclesiastical interests and is pushing with steady and insidious force into the educational system here in New York. Many stories might be told illustrating the care which must be taken to keep our children from being proselytized by Roman Catholic teachers, but the same church is not so eager for moral instruction. A boy cries if he accidentally breaks a crucifix who would not weep if he had told a black lie. Once a friend of mine told the story of Jesus to a group of Italian boys, purposely omitting the name. The boys listened attentively, but could not guess the name of the hero at all. What sort of religious training does this represent?

Great Feasts That Are Mockery to Religion

One hesitates to repeat neighborhood gossip as to the character of some priests, but at best it must be said that many of them are very far from the Christian ideal or even from high standards of decency. I have been amazed to see the approval with which an Italian audience, by no means Protestant, listened to a play wherein the priest was the villain. Every year in the month of July there is a great feast in honor of the Madonna of Mount Carmel, which is a beautiful illustration of popular Catholicism in an Italian colony. The feast lasts for three days and crowds come not only from New York City but from the country. It is without doubt one of the most picturesque sights in all New York and one most full of human interest. At night the commonplace tenement-lined streets are brilliant with arches of light and by day and night they are gay with bunting and flags. All sorts of street venders hawk their wares, but most interesting are the innumerable booths where painted candles are sold and waxed models of diseased parts of the body which are vowed to the Madonna in case she will cure the sufferer. Frequently processions go through the streets and children are often lifted up to pin dollar bills on the sacred banner. Doubtless there is in this much real devotion, but there is more pagan superstition, and the worst feature of it is that this elaborate expression of religious devotion is far divorced from morality. The most influential layman in last year's festival was a notorious saloonkeeper and gangster. Gossip in the colony has it that he paid $3,000 to rival gangs to protect his life when his own gang was broken up. This year he gave the chalice to the Madonna and it was on display for a long time at his saloon. In order to raise money for it, he advertised extensively a raffle, tickets for which were sold at a dollar. Three prizes were offered, the highest being of $100. The drawing was held in the back room of his saloon. Shortly after the festival not even his Tammany Hall association saved that same back room from being raided by the police as a gambling joint. Associated with this honored citizen as an "honorary committee" were the Tammany leader of the district and the assemblyman. It is interesting to note that the large sums of money required for lights and decorations are raised not so much from pious givers as from brewers, political leaders and others who find their own profit in it. Is it not a cause for rejoicing and for deep gratitude to God that in the very heart of this district in six years a Protestant church has been built up with a membership of over 300? Is not this very fact a justification of our labors?

To sum matters up: The Catholic Church claims spiritual jurisdiction over the thousands of Italians in a colony which is now perhaps the most criminal in New York. This same colony, which is noted far and wide for its religious festivals, is perhaps even more famed for its black hand gangs. No fair man will hold the Catholic Church entirely responsible for the evil social and moral conditions—all of us together must share that terrible responsibility—but can she escape peculiar blame under the circumstances? To the writer our duty seems fairly clear. To attempt the social and moral regeneration of such a district without the aid of religion is an appalling task and is doomed to failure. To allow religion to be entirely identified in the minds of these immigrants with the Roman Catholic Church as it is in their homes is to encourage agnosticism on the one hand and superstition on the other. Therefore the Protestant Church must go in with a wise, carefully thought out message and a truly Christian spirit seeking rather to advance the kingdom of God than to increase her own membership, realizing that these ends are not always identical. In all civic matters we must cooperate honestly and fairly with Jew, Catholic and agnostic in so far as they are interested with us in the welfare of the community.

We must train ourselves especially to recognize the good that there is in the Catholic Church and struggle against the spirit of religious hatred. We have no business to expend our energy in trying to proselytize the men and women who honestly find in the Catholic Church Christian hope and help in living Christian lives, but we have every business to preach and practice the gospel as we understand it for the sake of those whose religion is merely nominal or who find in it no moral support and no true sense of God. Furthermore, we are compelled by the attitude of the Roman Church itself to state to our own people clearly our grounds of difference, although it should always be our purpose to preach a constructive gospel rather than to attack any other faith. In the political life in these colonies we should deprecate every attempt to raise the religious issue, but we must have our eyes open for Roman Catholic encroachments and should meet them fairly and firmly. This is a hard program and it will require all the grace God can give us. We who are on the field need the prayers and support of the united Protestant church, and the inspiration of the glorious hope that God will bring into unity of spirit and loyal devotion to truth and righteousness all his children of whatever race or sign.

A Sunday School Library and the Bees

BY GERRIT VERKUYL

A VETERAN Sunday school missionary of the Northwest, Robert F. Sulzer, once had a unique experience in his efforts to collect funds for a Sunday school library. The people among whom he was organizing the Sunday school were not flushed with money, but they lived ten or more miles from the railway and were in need of more literature than they had, if ever anybody was.

So the missionary made a strong appeal in behalf of a $25 library. Naturally the responses came in slowly; but at last they were nearing the $15 mark. Then Mr. Sulzer announced that if anyone else would pledge $5 he himself would contribute an equal amount.

There were a few moments of silence. Then a tall brother arose in the rear and in a drawling voice declared that he had been saving for months to buy a hive of bees. Such a hive would cost $5, but he now pledged that sum to the Sunday school library and would get along somehow without the bees.

"God bless you, brother," said the missionary, "and I feel sure you'll get your honey just the same." But exactly how it was to happen he had not the slightest idea.

A few weeks later Mr. Sulzer visited the neighborhood again and came to the house of the man of the liberal heart. It was just about dinnertime and the man was unhitching his horses. But he could not wait till they got to the house before telling his remarkable story. He took Mr. Sulzer at once to his cabin door and showed him a spot above the door that looked as if some clay had been attached and had fallen off. Then the pioneer told what had happened.

When he reached home that Sunday, after he had pledged his $5 for the library, he found a big swarm of bees hanging over that door and could not get into the house until he had hived them. It was the biggest swarm the man had ever seen.

"You may be sure of that," said Mr. Sulzer; "God never does things by halves."

Though Mr. Sulzer is a truthful man, it seemed almost impossible for his fellow workers to believe the incident. Personally I have found that many do not give it credence. One day, however, when several friends of Mr. Sulzer were with him eating dinner at a hotel or restaurant, that very pioneer walked in and was compelled to relate his own version of the incident. It was as here told.

Growing Crops Over Ice in Alaska

The more that is learned of the wonders of Alaska the more apparent it is that the United States drove a tremendous bargain when it acquired that territory, says the Courier-Journal.

The opening up of farming in the Tanana valley brings attention to a new and unexpected source of wealth. The valley is 300 miles long and fifty miles wide. It is described as a vast bowl of solid ice thinly sprinkled with dirt. The bowl of ice never thaws save near the surface. But upon a foundation of perpetual ice farmers are raising bumper crops of grain and gardens are producing vegetables declared to be superior in yield and quality to any grown in the United States.

The strangest feature of Tanana valley farming is that it is possible only because the subsoil is eternally frozen. When the spring begins to thaw the surface the plow turns over the surface of the earth above the ice and as the thaw proceeds moisture is given off from underground, forming a perfect subirrigation system.

Getting Acquainted with Adirondack Loggers

BY FRANK E. HIGGINS

"WHAT! STILL LOGGING in northern New York? Can it be possible? I thought that was all over long ago." This would be a natural remark for anyone to make. But they are still logging in the Adirondacks. About 3,000 men are engaged in this business and their home is the same sort of rude logging camps that one finds generally where the great trees are falling as a sacrifice to man's needs and convenience. The remaining timber stands in St. Lawrence, Franklin and Hamilton counties.

It was my privilege to spend about two winter weeks in northern New York making a survey of the logging conditions in this part of our country under the supervision of the home mission committee of the Synod of New York. The one thing that made the deepest impression on my mind was the years that have passed, the large amount of timber that has been cut, the great mine of wealth represented, and the number of men engaged during all these years by the various lumber companies—and yet nothing, so far as I could find, had been done by our church for these sturdy men of the forest.

French-Canadians and Pennsylvanians Predominate

I found the French Canadians in large numbers, and a splendid class of men they are. Perhaps 30 per cent of the men were from Pennsylvania. No longer finding their lifelong occupation offering them employment in that state, they have moved temporarily with their companies to this new field. Everywhere I found the open door; in fact in my eighteen years' experience among lumbermen I have never received a warmer welcome than in this region.

Leaving Brandreth one stormy afternoon in the logging train I soon arrived at a small camp where I found a dear, motherly Christian woman doing the cooking for the crew. Her husband—who, by the way, had but one leg—was acting as "cookee," or as we would call him in Minnesota, "shanty boss" or "bull cook." As the camp was small (about thirty men) he was doing all such work. When I introduced myself this couple gave me a warm welcome, but at once commenced to warn me against getting discouraged.

"You know," the man said, "preachers are rare things up in these woods. In the summer there are lots of them—they come up to fish—and once in a while the priest comes to take up a collection. I suppose you will kind of want the boys to help you out a little?"

I explained that there was to be no "collection."

"Well, say, preacher," he asked, "what are you going around for, then?"

When I told him my past eighteen years had been spent in this work he paid me the compliment of assuring me that "I guess you must understand your job."

When it was my privilege to meet the proprietor of this camp I surely received a hearty welcome. Throughout the services everyone gave the most rapt attention and at the close all came to me begging me to come again. The next morning I was told the camp above was all French—the proprietor was French, the cook was French, the foreman was French and, since they were all Catholics, it would be folly for me to try to hold a meeting there. And though my experience with the French in the past had not always been delightful, nevertheless I felt constrained to go.

Warm Welcome from French Catholics

I reached the camp towards evening. On the way I met a man whom I took to be the proprietor—a Frenchman, and a splendid specimen of physical humanity. I was not mistaken in my impression; he was the chief. After telling him my errand he assured me I was welcome. Soon I was in camp and, as usual, at once found my way to the cook shanty. Here I found a man with his family, his wife acting as chief cook. I was quickly at home, visiting with the little children.

After supper I had little trouble getting the proprietor, cook and all the men gathered together for a meeting. The proprietor even went to the barns where the men were caring for their horses and told them to come in and bring their lanterns so there would be plenty of light. The men listened respectfully all through the service, and when I repeated the Lord's prayer I could hear many voices following me.

In some of the camps, though I assured them I was not expecting a "collection," the men insisted on doing something and in one camp the proprietor himself took up an offering, assuring me the men wanted to give and in this way show their appreciation of my coming.

"Him or Me"

By Charles Frederic Goss

THIS IS NOT A DISSERTATION on the grammatical construction of Police Lieutenant Becker's answer to the wife of Rosenthal the gambler, when she asked the official, in amazement at his raid upon her husband's gambling place, "Why, Charlie, what are you doing here"?

"Hush!" he whispered apologetically, "it had to be him or me!"

That is to say, "If I had not raided him somebody would have raided me. One of us had to be sacrificed and you realize of course that I could not permit it to be myself!"

It is upon this calm presumption of the inconceivableness of self-sacrifice, as revealed in this once notorious trial, that our emphasis falls. Neither gratitude nor loyalty, esprit de corps nor the sense of honor among thieves excited the faintest consciousness of obligation to protect a friend, at any cost of trouble to himself. Becker did not consider for one single instant the possible alternative of "suffering in his stead." Never, in either literature or life, has there been a more frightful exhibition of the hellish nature of sin's central principle, the love of self, than this naive confession. To Becker and every other actor in this drama "self-sacrifice" was utterly inconceivable.

And so had it been to the minds of the McNamaras and their gang of dynamiters. In their case, the alternative was "them or us"! In every predicament of peril, among such men the decision is instantaneous and unalterable. If the lash is going to fall it must fall on his shoulders, not mine!

What the horrors of existence might become if this state of mind should finally become universal the dynamiters and the grafters have made it easy for us to see, since the lid has been lifted from their world. Life in the jungles of Africa would be far better.

And yet the central philosophical principle of these vampires is cherished as the ultimate law of existence by multitudes of people in every walk of life. It is, in a word, the principle that the "fittest must survive"—i. e., the strongest or the quickest witted. It is the creed of all thoroughgoing materialists. Not many have the courage of their convictions like these men who so disclosed to a horrified generation of heedless men and women the logical issue of such a system.

* * * * * * *

Is there no middle ground between the doctrine of Jesus and that of Lieutenant Becker?

The doctrine of Jesus is that when somebody has to suffer, it had better be "me" than "him"; the doctrine of Becker, "him" than "me."

Radical, isn't it?

"He bore our sins in his own body on the tree, dying, the just for the unjust."

If you do not like the world in which the grafters, gamblers and dynamiters have been living, you have absolutely no other alternative but that of the Nazarene.

"Him or Me!" Those words keep ringing in my ears.

There is not a soul among us which is not confronted by that inescapable alternative, in minor matters though it may be, every day.

You are carving at the dinner table and there is a single, delicate little piece of meat remaining. There is no one to be served but a toothless old uncle (a dependent on your bounty) and yourself. Who is going to get it, "him" or "me"?

There is only one easy chair in the room and you are in it, when the door opens and in comes a tired old grandmother. Who is going to have it—"her" or "me"?

Your profits in business are shrinking and there must be a cut somewhere. On whose head shall the knife descend, your workmen or yourself, "him" or "me"?

Have you ever chosen, definitely and finally, between the doctrine of the grasping, greedy police lieutenant and the Carpenter of Galilee?

"I Was Blind; Now I See"

Remarkable Revolution of Life in Tennessee's Former Chief Champion of the Liquor Interests

"HE WHO ONCE PERSECUTED US now preacheth the faith of which he once made havoc." This Pauline quotation irresistibly occurs to one who hears ex-Governor M. R. Patterson of Memphis arguing fervently for the destruction of the liquor traffic with all the magic of eloquence which a few short months ago he was as fervently using in the traffic's behalf.

In fact, though no one knows—least of all Governor Patterson himself—what future service he is destined to render in the American temperance cause, the suddenness and completeness of overturn and reversal in his life quite inevitably suggest Saul of Tarsus for a parallel. There was the same fierceness of wrath before the change; the same boldness of a joyous inconsistency afterward; the same humble acknowledgment, morevover, that meeting Jesus Christ makes all things new.

The Friend of His Erstwhile Enemies

Of course, there have been those who doubted in Governor Patterson's case just as there were doubters in Saul's case, when "he essayed to join himself unto the disciples." But the miracle of difference in him has apparently by now convinced the most skeptical. One of the hardest-headed of the temperance leaders in Tennessee, who had felt the sting of Patterson's hatred as almost no one else, said: "It took three hours of heart-to-heart private talk with him to convince me, but I was satisfied before I quit. He's on the square." Some say that Patterson was "at the end of his string" when he turned to Christ and joined the church; he could do nothing else. But Governor Patterson himself would be the last man to deny that; he says it was just because he had proved the emptiness of everything the world could offer that he finally saw in Christ his only hope and refuge. And when he found Christ sufficient he could only say so.

The man's choices are all different. He has entered absolutely into new associations. His intimates today are the men whom he held most in contempt a year ago. "We know that we have passed out of death into life becaue we love the brethren," said John. Governor Patterson meets the test. And his thinking is equally changed. He can't feel that he was ever dishonest in his arguments for the saloon; he said and wrote what he saw. But he was unbelievably blind—so it seems to him now. "I can't conceive how I ever could have reasoned so, but I did," he says simply. But now he is a man with open vision. It is a study in psychology which almost uncannily hints at dual personality to hear Patterson, the converted man, reading the proliquor pleas of the unregenerate Patterson (embodied in the state papers of Tennessee) and calmly pointing out their flaws in logic and shortcomings in recognition of fact. No refutation of saloon apologies could be more convincing—refutation from the same lips that uttered them. But beyond that it proves something more: "If any man is in Christ he is a new creature."

Ex-Governor of Tennessee

The Ventured Arrow Which Went Home

Under God, Governor Patterson's chance to become a Christian came through a man who, in his own modest words, "writes a good many letters." That man is John Langdon Weber, a quiet, soft-spoken South Carolinian who is pastor now of the Madison Heights Methodist church in Memphis. Mr. Weber has a favorite pastoral method; he watches the papers and listens to the gossip of men in his town for news of any great sorrow or great joy which has befallen any fellow citizen of his. Especially does he note cases where the sins of men have found them out and brought them to humiliation. And into every such opening in the worldly armor of reserve that men wear Dr. Weber skillfully seizes the opportunity to thrust straightway his gentle sword of gospel appeal. "The Lord has blessed you greatly; will you honor him?" or "You have fallen into great trouble; will you not turn to Christ for succor?"

So it was that when the papers of Tennessee were telling broadcast how ex-Governor Patterson in Nashville had been connected with an episode of sensational disgrace, others jeered but Dr. Weber wrote a letter. Something after this manner its persuasion ran:

"Dear Governor Patterson: I have never met you, but I sorrow greatly for your humiliation through sin. Yet may not your day of shame become your day of blessing through your turning to the Lord Jesus Christ for salvation? Perhaps you will resent this; you have a right to. But I can't help writing."

And the ex-governor sent back word:

"Resent it? Never! You are the first minister who ever spoke to me about my soul. Come and see me."

The Convert, His Testimony and His Service

Many a long hour of talk and prayer, with politician and minister shut away from the world together, followed this exchange. Out of these long conferences Governor Patterson went to confess his faith at the altar of the Idlewild Presbyterian church in Memphis, where Dr. Crowe is pastor—sent there by the Methodist pastor himself because his mother who has been praying for him all these stormy years is a Presbyterian, and "there is where he belonged."

Moreover, to show his faith by his works, from the communion table Governor Patterson turned almost straightway to go out through his state speaking valiantly in behalf of his rival who overthrew him in politics—Governor Hooper—in the latter's desperate campaign to secure efficient legislation against the law-defying saloons in Memphis and Nashville. Hooper's struggle while Patterson was against him was a terrible fight; with Patterson as ally it was quickly victorious. And not content with this atonement the ex-governor swore himself an everlasting enemy from that day not alone against the saloons of Tennessee but against all the saloons of America—as he told cheering thousands in the late great anti-saloon convention at Columbus.

Mr. Patterson will not speak for temperance, however, without speaking also for religion. Like all men who have undergone great spiritual revolutions he is constrained to "testify." While he spoke these memorable words at Columbus, Dr. Weber sat near him dissolved in tears:

"My life has had deep sorrows. My soul has been tossed on the waves of angry seas. I have seen the trail of liquor everywhere. Going through life I have seen it drag down many of the associates of my boyhood, blasting their hopes and consigning them to untimely graves. I have seen its forked lightning strike my first-born, the child of my young manhood, and I have borne with him the suffering and tried to help him in his brave but sometimes melancholy struggle for redemption. At last I have felt its foul and stealthy blow as it turned upon me its deadly and shaming wrath—upon me who had pleaded before the people for its very existence.

"All this I knew and felt without a revelation of the deep pathos and the meaning of it all. I needed help, for I was groping and my feet were stumbling in the dark. Deep in humiliation, tortured and condemned in my own esteem, I thought of the oft-repeated phrases about the power of the human will to resist temptation and I found them as unsubstantial as the fabric of a dream.

"When logic failed and reason gave no answer I cast aside all pride of opinion, all thought of what the world might say or think, and went to the throne of almighty God. There, on bended knees, I asked for light and strength, and they came. The curtains of the night parted and the way was clear. I arose a changed man. An invisible hand has led me on to where the vision is unobscured. From a critic of others, I looked within. From an accuser I became a servant in my own house to set it in order. From a vague believer in the guidance of divine power, I have become a convert to its infinite truth. From an unhappy and dissatisfied man, out of tune with the harmony of life and religion, I have become happy and content, firmly anchored in faith and ready to testify from my own experience to the miraculous power of God to cleanse the souls of men."

From the painting by von Uhde "Suffer Little Children to Come Unto Me"

WHAT SHALL THE CHILDREN READ?

BY H. ELIZABETH BREEZE

WE PARENTS, most of us, try to maintain careful supervision over our children's boy and girl chums. Johnnie, we perhaps discover one day, wouldn't do for our Jimmie to chum with because he said bad words. Jennie was teaching our Susan to be deceitful, so she must go. Mary was learning from Elizabeth that a white lie was not altogether wrong. Exit Elizabeth. But are we, I wonder, exercising that same care in the supervision of the children's book chums? And this doesn't mean altogether in the matter of elimination, either. It means just as much the supplying of good books to eager little minds as the banishment of the vicious. For children must have comradeship of other children and of books, and it seems to me the wise selection counts for even more than the wise elimination. The child mind developed by constant association with what is good grows gradually toward a very natural and unconscious selection of the good when choice becomes the child's own.

What, then, shall we give our children to read to develop this ability to select wisely and well? My first suggestion would be, begin with "Mother Goose," and begin early. At 18 months Little Girl would beg, "See pitty boop?" or "Bears 'n' bow-wows, yes?" her way of asking for her favorites. Neither can one begin too early with Bible stories. The new graded Sunday school lessons are admirable. If all folders for beginners and primary grades are kept and each year made into a separate book, there will be a gradual development in methodical biblical instruction to which the half hour in the Sabbath school class cannot be compared.

Have you a mania, as I have, for clipping from periodicals little poems which seem too good to be lost sight of? These may be pasted on separate sheets of paper, selecting those which are appropriate for the various lessons. If the pages are decorated by pictures and borders cut from magazines, advertisements, etc., these little books can be made very attractive, and how the youngsters do enjoy coloring the pictures and helping in this work! We have already made up the "First Year Beginners' Book," "Second Year Beginners' Book" and "First Year Primary." The set for "Second Year Primary" is nearing completion and will soon be ready to put together. Oh, yes, it takes time, of course; but so does anything worth while. Little Girl knows these stories so well and the attractive little texts have so impressed on her mind the truths they teach that I have not found it necessary to buy any published book of Bible stories. These made at home books, too, seem so much more intimate than do books purchased at stores.

Give the children all the old classic fairy tales—"Cinderella," "Little Red Riding Hood," "Puss in Boots," "Little Goody Two-Shoes," "The Three Bears," among others. Several of these can be found in Scudder's "Fables and Folk Stories." "Prince Silver-Wings," by Edith Ogden Harrison, also contains some good fairy tales.

When they are a bit older the children will enjoy Alcott's "Flower Fables" and Ruskin's "King of the Golden River." "At the Back of the North Wind," by George Macdonald, is by no means to be overlooked, while Miss Mulock's "Little Lame Prince" and "Adventures of a Brownie" will delight any little boy or girl. Grimm's and Andersen's "Fairy Tales," too, will be found in every well-regulated child's library, as well as "Alice in Wonderland" and "Through the Looking Glass," by Carroll, and that fantastic little work of Kingsley's, "Water Babies." And then there is Kipling's "Just-So Stories."

"Aunt Amy's Animal Stories," by Amy Prentice, are an unfailing delight to young children — "Frisky Squirrel's Story," "Croaky Frog's Story" and others. Don't overlook "Æsop's Fables" or, to teach kindness to horses, Anna Sewell's "Black Beauty."

A love for poetry should be early cultivated—and to do this is not so difficult as it might seem, for children delight in the ring and swing of verse. Get first such books as Stevenson's "Child's Garden of Verses," "Riley Child-Rhymes," Eugene Field's "Lullaby-Land" and "The Story of Hiawatha," abridged for school use by E. Norris.

The imperative duty of giving children the right kind of mental food is brought home to me each evening when two hungry little neighbor boys who are not given that sort of food at home come over for me to read to them. Whatever else I select, I always have to include "The Bear Story," from "Riley Child-Rhymes." "The Shut-Eye Train," from "Lullaby-Land," is a close second as a favorite.

Nature stories, too, should have their special interest and educational value. What could surpass those wonderful little stories by Charles Lee Bryson, "Tan and Teckle," and "Woodsy Neighbors of Tan and Teckle"? Jane Andrews's "Stories Mother Nature Told Her Children" should also be included.

As the child grows older there is a craving for books of adventure. There seems to be a popular fallacy that these are enjoyed only by boys. My experience has been that any and every book loved by boys is treasured no less by Little Girl. Don't I myself remember lovingly "Mungo Park's Adventures and Travels" and long even now to own a copy of it?

The prime favorite in Little Girl's library at this moment, even taking precedence of "Robinson Crusoe," "Swiss Family Robinson" and Kipling's "Jungle Book," is "In Desert and Wilderness," one of those so-called "books for boys," by Sienkiewicz. Reading this together gave each of us rare pleasure. Near in rank to this is Mrs. Burnett's "Secret Garden," and truly a sweeter, more wholesome story it would be hard to find. It has none of the priggishness of "Little Lord Fauntleroy" and breathes of the big out-of-doors.

Stories Help to Impress Facts of History

The "Little Colonel" books, by Annie Fellows Johnston, are always highly prized. Begin with "The Giant Scissors," "The Little Colonel" and "Two Little Knights of Kentucky." Living on the banks of the Ohio river, as she does, "Uncle Tom's Cabin" seemed very real to Little Girl, while the stories in "Couldn't Be Bought," by Faye Huntington, helped impress facts learned in history. A humorous kind of book which will help children to think for themselves is "The Peterkin Papers," by Lucretia Hale.

Children are often enamored of circus life and think if they could only have a part in that wonderful parade they would be the happiest little people alive. To cure them effectually of this infatuation read to them "Toby Tyler; or, Ten Weeks with a Circus," by James Otis. "A Peep Behind the Scenes," by Mrs. Walton, also serves as a good antidote to the poison of the circus fever. A companion book to "Toby Tyler" is "Mr. Stubbs's Brother," by the same author.

"Alone in London," "Little Meg's Children" and "Jessica's First Prayer," by Hesba Stretton, and "Christie's Old Organ," by Mrs. Walton, will arouse sympathy for the abject poor. It is well, too, to have some books of reference, such as "Bird Neighbors," "A Flower Guide," by Chester Reed, "Water Wonders Every Child Should Know," by Jean M. Thompson, etc. We intend to add next to our library a butterfly book and later "How to Know the Trees" and a book on insect life. The next to be added in the story line will be "The Wide, Wide World"—yes, and I think, perhaps, even "Queechy," too. The latter is sometimes ridiculed, I know, as an old-fashioned book, yet the strongest impression left on my mind from reading this as a child seems to have been the wonderful background of the pine woods. I can almost get a whiff of them now, as I recall the story. I have "Arabian Nights" tucked away awaiting an awakened intelligence to appreciate it. "The Rose and the Ring," by Thackeray, has already been ordered and interest in "Pilgrim's Progress" has been aroused by relating to Little Girl some parts of the allegory, so that she has begun to inquire how much the book would cost. She will be ready for it when it appears.

I like "Uncle Remus"; so does Little Girl, but she does not have it in her library because she will insist on talking as Bre'er Rabbit talks after each renewed acquaintance with the book. For this reason I think it unwise to give children many dialect stories. "Stories from Dickens Every Child Should Know" has given Little Girl a taste for this author and I am looking forward to the time when we shall read his works together, also "Lorna Doone," Miss Alcott's books, Kate Douglas Wiggin's and other favorites.

Let the children have free access to their own books, by all means, but from the very beginning they should be taught that books are our friends and we must treat them well. They appreciate having their own little bookcase, too, and a book catalogue in which to enter by name and number every new acquaintance.

Wide Ground Covered in Bedtime Readings

It is a wise arrangement to read to the little ones every evening just before bedtime. It is marvelous what an amount can be accomplished by this method. We have always four or five books on hand at a time. I like to read first a few pages from a more solid book, such as "A Child's History of England," "Autobiography of Benjamin Franklin," nature stories, etc. Then follow with a little poetry, sometimes even reading from "Masterpieces of British Literature." "The Charge of the Light Brigade," by Tennyson, "We Are Seven," "The Pet Lamb" and "The Daffodils," by Wordsworth, and "To a Mouse," "To a Mountain Daisy" and "A Man's a Man for a' That," by Burns, are all special favorites. Tennyson's "May Queen" is a much loved poem, too. After this I usually have some nonsense book or fairy tale and wind up with a Bible story.

When a book is commenced it should be read through to the end, and having several on hand gives variety. If a book is at all worth while one reading is not enough. Nearly all those I have mentioned have been read at least twice and some of the Bible stories, fairy tales, etc., over and over and over. At present we are reading "Tan and Teckle," "Andersen's Fairy Tales," "Swiss Family Robinson," "Mother Goose" and Geike's "Life of Christ for the Young."

I think "Mother Goose" will reach the top shelf after this. I notice for the first time a tendency to make fun of some of the jingles, an indication that they are being outgrown. I would not recommend Geike's "Life of Christ" for a child; it is too ponderous, though I do not think it well always to read down to children. My plan is occasionally to give them something that is a little beyond their ken, for a child is just a question box, and will gain a whole fund of information in this way.

This list of mine is by no means exhaustive. Other books will suggest themselves to you as perhaps better filling the individual needs of your own little ones. These are simply the books which compose our little girl's library up to the present time, and which I have tried to select with great care. They are intended as suggestions for reading matter for children under 8 years of age, though many of the books mentioned here would be enjoyed by older children. I am indebted to Hamilton W. Mabie for a list published in a popular magazine some years ago as to what books to get for young people up to 20 years of age. In building up Little Girl's library I have not slavishly followed this list, eliminating some and adding others; but as a guide I found it most helpful. I now pass on my list to others who may perhaps receive from it some benefit, for

> "Books, we know,
> Are a substantial world, both pure and good;
> Round these, with tendrils strong as flesh and blood,
> Our pastime and our happiness will grow."

The Passing of the "Genro"

No longer are "the elder statesmen" all-powerful in Japan, says The North China Herald, in noting the development of constitutionalism which has become apparent since the death of the late mikado. The growth of democratic sentiment in Japan has been most marked in recent years, and every day the desire for a more liberal form of government becomes stronger. Many events might be cited as evidence of this fact, but the most striking was the determination with which the Seiyukai pressed the vote of censure upon Prince Katsura's late cabinet.

With the growth of the democratic spirit there has been free discussion of the system that permits the control of national questions by the "genro," or council of elder statesmen. It is fairly argued that this system is strangely out of keeping with constitutional politics. So strong has the feeling against this interference in national affairs become that ministers have been known to accept office on the condition that they would not be required to submit to dictation by the genro. There is a widespread desire for the abolition of the system, which gives to the men who have retired from the active service of their country so much power that their favor is necessary to the life of the government. This desire has gradually developed since the death of Prince Ito, until today opponents of this higher council believe that it should be allowed to die a natural death. Unless new men are chosen to fill vacancies there is every indication that the genro will gradually become a thing of the past.

Fresh Air Good—in the Right Place

It was for a long time supposed that the bad effects of close and crowded rooms were due to chemical impurities in the air, to excess of carbon dioxid or to organic poison, or else to lack of oxygen. No one of these explanations is tenable in the light of recent experiment. On the contrary, all the ill effects observable in crowded rooms seem to depend on the stagnation, high temperature and moisture in the air; in a word, to those factors that disturb the normal heat regulation of the body. If the temperature and moisture are kept low, human exhalations may be allowed to accumulate without noticeable effect to a point far above that ordinarily observed in the most "badly ventilated" room. On the other hand, if the experimenter breathes "pure" outdoor air through a tube, but allows his body to be confined in a small chamber where temperature and moisture are at a high point, he will soon have all the symptoms commonly attributed to "breathing foul air."

Altogether there is still a sound physiologic foundation for the belief in the virtues of the outdoor life for the healthy as well as for the tuberculous person.

Thanksgiving at Cabin o' Wildwinds

BY ADA MELVILLE SHAW

PART III.

COLD, indeed, must be the day and wild the storm that empties the saloons. It was noon of that bitter day before Thanksgiving when a driver dropped rein at the "Glad Hand" shack, where a dozen men drank or dozed or quarreled beside the hot stove. The rider was white with snow. Icicles hung about his face. He was greeted with a shout.

"'Lo, Pete! Got your sheep along? Come in and cool off. Gee, man, you're froze. Have one on us, Pete—have two us, old man!"

Peter Frink made no reply. He beat the snow from his skin cap, shook his "sheepskin" from his shoulders and with his gauntlets beat the snow out of his chaps. Standing with his back to the red-hot stove he wiped the snow and water from his face and stood there, perhaps for ten minutes, as impassive as a man in bronze. The crowd knew him and knew better than to worry him. Pete's temper, drunk or sober, was not one to fool with—when he "looks like that."

The bartender was newly come to the Glad Hand. "Won't you have something?" he asked. Then Frink moved, not to the bar, but around behind it. He looked the array of condiments and sauces keenly over, selected a bottle and put it carefully in his breast pocket, testing the cork first. Next he helped himself to two large "red-hots," intensifying their caloricity by generous showers of cayenne peper, and ate them slowly beside the stove—keeping his face well away from the heat. This done, he stepped up to the bar and reached to a glass receptacle filled with lump sugar, took four lumps and stepping to the door, opened and whistled softly. A cold muzzle touched his palm and gathered in the treat. Returning, he stood before the fire for a third short space, replaced his cap and coat, drawing flaps and collar close. Then he looked about the room and spoke his first words. "So long, boys. Eat a bone for me tomorrow," and almost with the slam of the door was on his pony's back and away into the trackless desert.

"Got 'em good and plenty this time," asserted one of the company.

"Nope." It was an older man who spoke. "Not this time. Somethin' doin'. 'Tain't sheep, neither."

"Does he always help himself that way?" asked the bar man, who was something of a tenderfoot.

"Pete," averred a third, "never minds no man. And Pete never robs no man. Pete's like that blizzard out there—jest as white and jest about as manageable. What 'd he take?"

"Whole dollar's worth of beef extract."

"Dollar's safe. Somethin' doin', that's all."

Maggie had slept eight hours straight on. The baby had waked and cried and nursed and waked and cried and slept again. The little mother was far, far away in a land where birds sang and trees rustled and roses bloomed and water rippled through thick green grass. Her mother walked beside her and Joe was there. Then she heard her name and struggled to get back to the place she knew for home, but it seemed too far to go. Someone shook her rather roughly and she struggled harder.

"Come, Mis' Ruthven, ma'am. It's Pete callin' you. Ain't drunk this time, ma'am. Come, now! Don't you hear this little bum lamb baa-ing for its mother? No, it's not Joe. He'll be along. Wake up, lady! Got to git ready fer Thanksgiving. There—there—don't be scairt. Lord, you're as safe as if you was in your mother's arms. Hain't anyone told you that of old Pete? Pete wouldn't hurt a bum lamb. Come, now!"

When Maggie could see and understand she was looking into Pete's face, the screaming child lay on his rough bosom, there was a roaring fire in the stove and the sun was streaming through the south window.

"You can hev the lamb in a minute. She's safe. Drink this—all of it—won't hurt you—it's to set the inside fires goin'." It was a brimming cup of hot extract of beef.

Still dazed, Maggie drank and with the new strength that stole through her came the sense of safety. She began to pour out questions. Pete laid the child in her arms and pushed them back upon the pillow.

"I'll tell you. It's Wednesday afternoon. What time did you lie down? This mornin'? Well, that's not bad—not bad at all. There's mutton thawin' in the oven. Had to kill a sheep last week—got mixed up in one o' these here con—beautiful fences. Thought I'd like a bit of roast mutton. Now if you aim to crawl out in a little, I'll go 'tend to that there cayuse o' mine. Come a long ways through the summer breezes. Wood? Oh, I soon dug some wood out. Who do you think I am, anyhow? Ma'am, I've learned to fry sheep meat on the warm side of a blizzard and go to sleep leanin' on the wind."

The cayuse fed, Pete came back and cooked sheep meat and made coffee and toasted bread and waited on Maggie and the "bum lamb" while the sun poured its life and hope upon them all.

"Now, ma'am, let's have a council o' war. Joe said he'd be here today. Well, all the trains was stuck out in the sunshine and roses, last I heard. So likely he won't get in till tomorrow. Ef you think you can stand it, I'll jes' roll up in my blankets out in the barn tonight and first thing come daylight I'll catch those broncs an' hike out an' fetch your man an' that there turkey home. Sure, I'll eat with you. I been aimin' for several years to eat a Christian turkey, but somehow never seemed to git to it. There's plenty o' wood. So if you'll jes' give me the lantern I'll sort o' wrop it in my arms—gits chilly nights—an' sleep like that little lamb was sleepin' when I bust in the door this afternoon. Yes, I'll tell you sometime how I come to come—only there ain't much to tell. Never is about real things."

Maggie feared for the old man setting out over unfenced miles in the still bitter cold.

"Little woman," he said, looking at her as if she were a child, "I've trailed these here plains nigh onto forty years—I've hunted timber wolves an' had 'em hunt me—an' I've brought the flocks through too many places, where there was no place to come through, to count 'em. When you've done that, there's marks stickin' up all along everywhere that no tenderfoot hain't expected to see. You jes' keep the pot boilin' an' we'll be back before sundown. Look fer us a leetle after you see us! An' no news is always good. You'll be took care of—you an' the bum lamb."

"Oh, don't I know it!" cried Maggie, and there was that in her voice and about her sensitive lips that turned the hard old face—weather-hard and drink-hard but not heart-hard—gently aside.

So the mother of the "bum lamb" set the kettle boiling. She could not work out her joy in pies or cakes or cranberry sauce or such luxuries of the civilized. She thawed out the lard and made a great pan of biscuits. She put glasses of the precious home jelly to thaw. She set beans boiling like mad over the fire—homesteaders cannot take time to work out the convolutions of "Boston baked." She made the sheep meat left from Pete's generous providing into a savory stew, discovering that one can use frozen vegetables and not die. She spread her table with a fair white cloth and rubbed up all her simple settings-forth. She robed Bright Eyes in her very best and she brought out from her trunk a soft cashmere of girlhood days and as she fluttered the bright ribbons, blushed and laughed to think how Joe would kiss her.

Then she saw a speck miles away, and it came and came, slowly—oh, so slowly, but surely, on and on and on, bucking the drifts and headed straight for love and home.

"They have picked up someone to eat with us!" cried the watcher happily, for there were three in the wagon and one was a woman bundled into shapelessness.

The steaming horses drew up close beside the door and Maggie ran out into the snow to meet Joe's arm. He pushed her back a little and looked into her eyes. "All safe, darling?"

"Every bit, Joe! Who is with you? Mrs. Jones?"

Joe turned to help out the woman who was climbing with difficulty from the high seat while Pete held the bronchos.

"Someone I know?" said Maggie, hospitably. "I am glad you've come, anyhow. Come right into the house."

The stranger stumbled into the warm room and tugged at her wraps, uncovered her face, and Maggie, after one unbelieving stare, cried—Joe had never heard so sweet a cry before, he thought—"Mother! It's mother! Joe! It's—my—very—own—mother!"

Fortunately the other grandmother had sent the "big bronze" cooked, so Maggie managed, in spite of her overrunning joy, to spread the feast in Cabin o' Wildwoods. The women, for the most part, feasted on the sight of faces beloved, but the men's appetites seemed bottomless.

"How did you come to do it, Joe?" asked his wife, squeezing her mother's hand under the table.

THE HOME COUNCIL

Thanksgiving—Then and Now

By Aunt Susan

This bit of homely reminiscence will turn more than one heart back, in wistful remembrance, to long-ago Thanksgivings when, its circle still unbroken, the family offered thanks to God and shared together, in loving cheer, the fruits of his bounty. But though such remembrance may have its tinge of sadness, upon the love of those golden days have been laid the foundations of our homes today. And so, at this Thanksgiving time, let special gratitude be ours that to us has been vouchsafed a sacred past

I HAVE BEEN THINKING about the Thanksgiving days of seventy years ago. Probably there are few readers of The Continent who remember the brick ovens by the side of the fireplaces in which our mothers used to bake. They were deep and had to be heated by wood especially prepared, called oven wood. This wood was split very fine, the length of the oven. After it was burned the ashes were drawn out on a long-handled shovel, and the bottom of the oven was swept clean with a brush broom.

On the first Thanksgiving Day that I remember mother's brick oven was heated in good season. The chicken pie, rice and Indian puddings were in the oven, in good time for dinner when meeting should be out. The pumpkin and mince and apple pies were baked the day before and stood on the north buttery shelf, a big pan of nut cakes beside them. There was sauce made of apples stewed in boiled cider, and cheese of mother's make. It was the New England custom to load the table with everything that could be provided. All the family went to church except mother or one of the older girls who could set the table and cook the vegetables; the rest of the dinner could go from the oven to the table as soon as the family should come from meeting.

The girls in those days all wore homemade woolen dresses. My sisters and I wore pretty plaids, the yarn spun and colored and woven by my mother's and sister Mary's own hands. If we had new ones they were kept to be worn for the first time on Thanksgiving Day. We children didn't think of asking to stay at home; but how long and tiresome those sermons were!

Years have passed. The dear mother who loved us and labored so faithfully for us has folded her hands and gone to her rest, Jane, the fun-loving and home-loving, has bidden good-by to her little ones and lies beside her mother. Ozro has also laid down his work and left her who needs him so much.

Another Thanksgiving Day has come. The old hearthstone is still kept warm for those who have gone out to homes of their own. The old grandfather, Aunt Mary and Aunt Susan are the homekeepers; all are expectant. There are LaRoyal and Ann, Clinton and Lucy, Lester and Carry, and fifteen grandchildren—children of the children. Yesterday Aunt Mary made a big crock of raised nut cakes. One is given to each of the children as they come in, to "stay their stomachs" till dinner is ready. Two long tables are set in the big kitchen, for no child must be asked to wait for second table today.

Grandfather's blessing on this occasion is a prayer. The hungry children think that grandpa remembers a great many things to be thankful for. They are thankful, too, in their way—probably not for the year's plentiful harvest or for the signs of prosperity to be seen all over our land; but they expect a good dinner and lots of fun in the afternoon. Aunt Mary and Aunt Susan have tried to provide just such a dinner as grandmother used to have, always finishing with apple, pumpkin and mince pies, rice and Indian puddings, coffee and nut cakes. These are indispensable at a New England Thanksgiving dinner.

After dinner the children are kindly told that there is a fire in the little stove in the front chamber. The room is warm and if they play there perhaps grandfather will not be disturbed by the noise. There are three stairways in this house, some going one way and some another to the warm room. But do you suppose that anything but lock and key could keep these youngsters in that warm room? There are the hall, the front chamber and two small bedrooms, all opening into each other, round what used to be a big chimney, now a large closet. The doors are all thrown open and round and round they go, running, chasing, screaming, laughing. It would seem as if the old house that has weathered the gales of winter and the storms of summer for so many years is now to fall upon our heads. It shakes from "turret to foundation stone." Grandfather groans and closes his eyes.

Soon we hear little feet running up the creaky garret stairs. Probably their owners give the spinning wheel and swifts and quill wheel and reel a few whirls, but it is rather dark up there and down they come.

Verses Old and New

A PRAYER

Dear God, I thank thee for the sweet,
  Fair hour of present happiness,
  Though sorrows close upon it press,
And though its rainbow glow be fleet;
  From it I gather courage still
  For coming ill.

I thank thee for the pleasure found
  In little things—the smiling eyes
  Of a dear friend; the rich surprise
Of new-blown roses, morning-crowned;
  And for the beauty of the thought
  One rapt hour brought.

I thank thee for the priceless boon
  Of loyal, tried companionship—
  A friend with smile of eye and lip
With whom my heart may still commune,
  Whose hand-clasp hath a potency
  To strengthen me.

I thank thee for the touch of pain
  That seared away some selfish dross,
  And out of bitterness and loss
Brought forth a loftier spirit gain—
  A kinship with the sad and lone
  I had not known.

—L. M. Montgomery.

Lester proposes a run to the barn. "All right," they agree. Down the three stairways they plunge, through the sitting room, out at the east door. Grandfather smiles and heaves a sigh of relief, for is not this a promise of respite? Now he can talk with his children. They are sitting round the stove in the sitting-room. St. Mary, as her minister calls her, who always mothered the rest of us; Lucy, who is so kind and friendly that everyone loves her; Ann and Carry with their bright speeches, and Susan, the youngest. The grandfather and his sons visit pleasantly as they always do.

The children don't find things very interesting at the barn. They can't jump on the hay, for the mows are full clear to the sparrows' nests among the rafters. They look down cellar at the cows and scramble up and down the ladder a few times, then they decide to return to the house.

The day draws to a close, as all days do. Good-bys are said, and the children all agree that this Thanksgiving Day at grandpa's has been the jolliest day of all the year.

Bible Stories and the "Young Idea" ●

When Mrs. Patience Pennington, author of "A Woman Rice Planter," entered on her stupendous task of operating two plantations, she decided that a Sunday school would help the negroes to become honest and diligent. So every Sunday afternoon she taught at her home all the little boys and girls who could be induced to come. But the telling of the Bible stories sometimes involved Mrs. Pennington in doctrinal difficulties from which she was put to much pains to extricate herself. The story of the creation, for instance, presented opportunity for questions most embarrassing to the raconteur. The children listened to the story with breathless interest, says Mrs. Pennington, then one little fellow asked:

"Miss Patience, what would have happened if they had never eaten the apple? Would they have stayed in the garden?"

"Yes," I said with confidence.

"And never had to wear any clothes?"

More faintly I answered, "No, I suppose not."

"Well," he said, "the garden would have had to be made much larger for all the children that were to come."

"Yes," I said, "I suppose the whole world would have been a garden," but I was glad to leave the subject and get onto firmer ground.

However, the next Sunday, when I asked them to tell me the story, they went on swimmingly until I asked who ate the apple first. Most chivalrously they all answered, "Adam."

"No," I said, "I am sorry to say it was Eve."

"Then," piped up the squeaky little voice, "then, Miss Patience, women are badder than men."

"Oh, no," I exclaimed, "but Eve was beguiled by the serpent, who told her the fruit would make her wise. The great Creator made man first and meant him to be the protector and guide of the woman, and when she offered him the apple he should have refused and said, 'Light of my eyes, we must not eat it. The Great Being who made us and gave us this beautiful home forbade us to eat of that fruit.' But Adam failed in his duty and ate the apple, and they were driven out."

My sturdy little brown-eyed thinker, who had been listening with profound attention, said:

"Miss Patience, what would have happened if Eve had eaten the apple and Adam hadn't?"

I was completely routed. "I cannot think what would have happened then."

There was a chorus of little voices: "Why, Eve would have been driven out and he would have had the garden for hisself!"

Worsting High Living Costs

During the recent national dairy show held in Chicago a demonstration of cooking many dishes with milk and cheese as the main components was given by the household economy departments of the University of Iowa and the University of Illinois under the auspices of the Clean Food Club of Chicago.

Among these demonstrations was one of a dish called "Boston roast," the ingredients of which are one can of kidney beans or cooked beans, a half pound of grated cheese, bread crumbs and salt. The preparation is as follows:

"Mash beans. Add cheese and sufficient bread crumbs to form into a roll. Place in buttered baking pan and bake in moderate oven. Baste frequently with one-half cup hot water in which one tablespoon butter is melted. Serve the roast with tomato sauce and a few drops of onion juice."

Enough of this roast for six persons costs 25 cents and is claimed to contain more nourishment than $2 worth of roast beef, that luxury whose cost has soared almost unreachably high. So good a substitute is worth a trial at least.

YOUNG AMERICA

Vacation Fun with Our Boys and Girls

[Early in the summer the boys and girls of Young America were asked to remember any interesting vacation experiences they might have, and to write stories about them for the other boys and girls when vacation days had come to an end. The following are the best of the many good stories that came to the editor. Two first prizes were offered, one to boys and girls of 14 and 15, the other to those under 14. The second and third prizes were open to all contestants 14 and under.]

Vacationing in Jerusalem

[FIRST PRIZE]

AFTER A TWO DAYS' JOURNEY from Beirut we, a party of four boys and my father, arrived in Jerusalem about noon one July day. When we were rested we walked out to Mount Olivet. This hill lies just a short distance to the east of the city. Full in our face as we came out of Stephen's gate was the Russian cathedral in the garden of Gethsemane, with five gilded domes on its four corners and top. These globes make a striking contrast with the plainness of the olive trees covering the southwest slope. We walked up and on reaching the top we looked off upon the hills of Moab to the east, upon the Dead sea, to the south towards Bethany, and upon Jerusalem, now beautifully lighted up by the setting sun.

On our way to Bethlehem we passed a well where the three wise men are said to have seen the reflection of the star; we also passed a convent erected to the memory of Elijah. Here he is said to have lain down on a rock upon which he imprinted his form. We next passed Rachel's tomb, probably one of the most authentic places in the Holy Land. We walked on to the Church of the Nativity, where we saw the spot where Christ was born, now paved with marble and hung with countless lamps and candles.

We next visited Golgotha and the garden tomb. This tomb is exceedingly impressive and very likely the one where Christ was buried. It is divided into two chambers, the second of which is cut into three tombs, evidently meant for a man, his wife and one child. Outside there is a narrow ditch hewn out of stone for the rock to roll in and block the entrance.

The Mosque of Omar was the next and last place we visited. This building was constructed by Solomon and later changed into a Christian church, still later into the present mosque. There are peculiar things about the mosque. The first is a stone in the floor in which are three nails. These nails have been there, tradition says, ever since the world began, when there were nineteen. As soon as these three nails come out the end of the world is near. If the visitor puts a franc on any of the nails he is sure to get into heaven.

When You Visit Jerusalem You'll See the Mosque of Omar, Too

The second peculiarity is that of two pillars set quite close together. Whoever could pass between them, it is said, got safely to heaven.

Two Boys at a Conference

[FIRST PRIZE]

OVOCA MEANS "the meeting of the waters." At Ovoca, Tenn., a large spring flows into the stream right above the lake, another one empties into the lake itself, and a third runs into the stream below the lake. The water alone would make this an attractive place to spend a vacation. But there are other features worth mentioning—the eating house on top of the hill, the cottages halfway between the lake and the eating house, the soda fountain near the lake, the tennis courts at one side and the pleasant woods in the distance with their flowers and ferns.

The Presbyterian Church, U. S. A., held a workers' conference at Ovoca in July. My brother and I went with our mother. As soon as we boys could put away our tennis rackets, fishing tackle and baseball things we went on a tour of inspection. Later we went in swimming and continued to do this every afternoon until we left. I was not sorry when supper time came, for I was hungry. We had a fine meal, fried chicken and biscuit being the principal things.

The next morning we went to see the falls. Right below the lake the water descends about a hundred feet, making a beautiful cataract. The water often hits ledges of rock, which break its fall to some extent. We had a shower bath under the falls, which was a very painful but delightful amusement.

So the days passed. Sometimes we would play baseball and at other times tennis. Often we would take long tramps and one day we went fishing. Almost every evening we attended the vesper services which were held on the platform by the lake. These sermons were easy for boys to understand, and we enjoyed them very much. Sunday we attended Sunday school and church. Monday evening Senator Webb spoke in the auditorium. He told us of what he had seen and done in the war between the states, which, of course, was very interesting. Wednesday evening Dr. Stewart lectured. His subject was "Lopsided Folks," and what he had to say was as amusing as the title. Every morning there were lectures and classes which the older people attended.

When we left Ovoca it was with the hope that we would be able to visit the summer resort next year.

Our "Sweet" Hour

[SECOND PRIZE]

"MURIEL," I glanced lazily up from "Anne of Green Gables," "did you say a whole cup of sugar?" My chum stood in the doorway looking down at me. "Miss Lazy," she taunted before I could answer.

"I said a cup of sugar," I replied, "and perhaps you'd better use a whole cup, for I don't think a broken one would——" But she had fled.

We were spending our vacation at home, and my friend Lois was making some pull candy. I had laid my head against the chair back and was just going to make a contract with Mr. Sandman when I heard, "Muriel! Hurry! Help! Come quick!"

Leisurely I arose. I knew Lois thoroughly. When I arrived in the kitchen she was dancing on one foot, then the other, and wringing her hands in a really amusing fashion. The candy was splashing and spluttering in the pan in a threatening manner.

"Stir it," I commanded.

"I didn't think of that," she exclaimed.

I rushed and turned the gas off. Lois is a dear, but she really is the most helpless being imaginable. My beloved heroine must wait, for I saw where I was needed and it wasn't in the parlor. Meanwhile Lois got me a spoon, and with another person at the helm, she became quite capable. The dish buttered, I poured the candy out to cool.

Lois was eager to taste it, so at last she put her finger gingerly into it. The candy was hot. Again she began her dancing exhibition, this time because the candy burned her finger. Then she rushed to the water faucet and turned it on. In a moment the candy had hardened and hung like an icicle from her finger.

After that excitement had subsided we decided to pull the candy. No sooner had we begun than the door bell rang.

"Do go to the door," Lois begged.

"Go yourself," I retorted.

With our sticky fingers held before us we sank into chairs, laughing. The situation was ludicrous. Two girls in their 'teens unable to open a door!

Again the bell rang. Lois finally opened it. I heard, "Got any rags to sell, ma'am?" "No," snapped Lois as she heard my smothered laugh.

In experiences like this our summer passed, and it wasn't monotonous, either. We let each day take care of itself instead of planning and trying to force a square day to fit a round plan. At the end of our vacation we were rested and ready for the schooldays that followed.

What the Class Boy Did

[SECOND PRIZE]

IT HAPPENED that I was "class boy" of the class of 1898 in Williams College—that is, the first boy born to any of the men who graduated in that year—and as we had our fifteenth reunion this year I had a great many interesting times.

Williams is in Massachusetts and on June 12 father and I started for Niagara Falls, our first stop. We watched the falls till I thought there never was anything so grand. We left Niagara that afternoon and, staying over Sunday at Seneca Falls, we arrived at Williams Monday.

Once there we went right to the Delta U fraternity and had a shower. We made many friends there, but that was not the real fun; that began on Monday, the 23rd, which started commencement week. Each class had a uniform or a badge of some sort. The 1910 men were sailors, 1908 pirates, and 1903 little children. Our class had '98 arm bands and white hats. For three days we did nothing but march around town and stay at the headquarters, but it was fun. I am sending one of the pictures I took while there.

From Williams we went to Schenectady, N. Y., and had the privilege of staying with the mayor for ten days. The thing I liked best was the great safe and sane Fourth. In the morning there was a large parade, in the afternoon free ice cream, a balloon ascension and a toy balloon race; but at night there were $600 worth of fireworks.

From Schenectady we went to Leon, N. Y., and found mother and my brother. There I learned to swim and had many good times in the water.

August 15 some friends from Ohio took us to Cleveland in their automobile and on the 29th we left for home.

[THIRD PRIZE]

I HAD NEVER BEEN to the zoo before, and this trip one day of my vacation was a long expected pleasure. When we reached the bird house there was quite a concert going on. One parrot could talk and we stopped quite a while by his perch, listening to his "Polly wants a cracker."

Then came one of the most delightful things of all, the monkeys. The best of all was one baby and mother. They actually hugged each other like humans. When the mother sprang at the cage wall to drive away the crowd that had collected the baby clung to her tail.

We visited the bear pits next. One of the polar bears was taking his bath. It was interesting to watch him. Then there was a brown bear who had a queer trick of sitting down and clapping his hands for sweets.

The elephants were bathing in a pool and we went to see them. One came out with a keeper. He waded at first, but as the depth increased he began to swim. When he had gotten his body wet he ducked his head several times, occasionally sending forth spray from his gigantic trunk.

Then we saw the rhinoceros, hippopotamus, giraffe and many kinds of deer. It would be unfair were I not to mention one dear little fallow deer who poked out his nose to be petted.

Last of all we visited the reptiles. I did not like the snakes so well as the animals, however, but the turtles and alligators attracted me. After a stroll we had to leave, but I shall always hold this as one of my best summer holidays. CATHERINE WILSON (age 10).

Camping in the Lebanon

[THIRD PRIZE]

ONE SATURDAY MORNING at 6 o'clock mother and father and I started for an all-day drive to camp. We arrived much later than we expected, for we changed carriages when we were halfway there and the first driver let the horses go slowly because he did not know that we were going to change. The second driver wasted an hour feeding his horses when we were a little way from the town where we got horses and a donkey to ride up to the camp.

Now I must go back and tell you about the place where we had our lunch. It was a sort of cave and yet it was not; it was a shelf in the rock covered with maidenhair fern and with water running down everywhere.

The next day was Sunday and we had a little Arabic service with the servants in one of the tents. That evening it sprinkled a little and we wondered if it would rain in the night. Rain in the summer in Syria is very unusual, but in the night we were awakened by rain on the tent roof. In the morning the ground was fearfully muddy. I walked from our sleeping tent to the dining-room tent and took off my shoes and left them outside of the tent like a true Arab.

We went to camp not only to enjoy ourselves, but to work with Dr. Ford, one of the well-known missionaries of Syria, on the revised Arabic hymn book; at least, my father went for that purpose, and mother helped them work on it, too.

Monday morning I spent playing games and working out puzzles and so on. In the afternoon it had stopped raining and the ground had dried a little, so I could play around outside. I made a little path in the afternoon from one tent to another.

This Is Where Frederick Camped. He stands at the Right with the Horse

We often went to the cliff which was in front of the camp, from which we could see Sidon and Tyre and the sea. And one day in one of the trees father saw a chipmunk. He had his rifle, but missed. In Syria there is no law against shooting animals like that.

On Wednesday I went to my cousin's camp and spent a night and the next day rode back on a horse that balked whenever I hit him.

On Monday we arrived at home safely.

With the Veterans at Gettysburg

[THIRD PRIZE]

MY FATHER is a civil war veteran and I accompanied him and my mother to the national encampment at Gettysburg. The camp prepared for the soldiers was 416 acres in extent. The tents were tan colored. Each state had several rows. At night it was a beautiful sight. In the camp besides the soldiers were the Boy Scouts and some of the regular army soldiers.

These observations were made June 30. The next morning we walked through and saw the "rebels" in their bluish gray uniforms and heard their queer yell. We talked to a number of soldiers of both armies. They had tents where the cooks prepared the meals. I saw a chef take a meat loaf out of the oven. It was about a yard long and half a yard wide.

Frederick Dined in This Tent. They Like Gay Colors in Syria

Every tent was numbered; and good, large tents they were, for they could well accommodate eight cots. The Red Cross and state of Pennsylvania had tents established all over the field to take care of those veterans who were overcome by the heat. They also had ambulances in the town. The state constabulary were at every street crossing, and in spite of the fact that there were thousands of vehicles not one accident occurred.

We went to a cyclorama. It was a round building with scenes of the battle all over the walls in life size. One evening there were a few fireworks on Little Round Top. Everyone was disappointed in them, for all they had were rockets and some other little things.

On the Fourth of July I had the misfortune to miss seeing President Wilson, although mother saw him. That afternoon we had a very nice picnic at Spangler's Spring. It is a beautiful spot and I don't know when I ever went to such a nice picnic.

There is just one more thing I am going to mention. A union soldier and a Confederate bought a hatchet and took it out to Little Round Top and buried it.

A Day on the St. Lawrence

[ESPECIALLY GOOD]

WHAT BETTER WAY is there of spending a hot summer day than to go for a trip on the river? And that is just what our Sunday school did one Monday in July. A ferryboat load came from Brockville, 550 got on at Ogdensburg and there were a great many at Morristown, so that when we stopped at Brockville there was not room for all who wished to go from there.

The scenery was lovely on the St. Lawrence, especially on the Canadian shore, and the many small islands dotted with summer cottages unfolded like a panorama as we went swiftly up the river. We all took our dinner and supper in baskets and ate on deck, the bracing air giving us fine appetites.

As we drew near Kingston we could see underground caves and many forts on the Canadian side and one especially large fort in Kingston harbor.

When the boat stopped we hurried to get a trolley to Ontario park, but took the belt line by mistake and only went around the city. There are some fine residences in Kingston, most of them made of brick and stone. There is hardly a wooden house to be seen. We saw the Church of the Good Thief, Queen's University, the Kingston high school and the greater part of the residential portion of the city.

Just as our ride was almost over we heard the boat whistle, and perhaps we weren't scared! When the car stopped we got off and ran just as fast as we could right through the streets to catch that boat. I am sure people thought we were crazy. We got down to the boat just as the gangplank was being drawn in, a breathless crowd indeed!

It grew dark rapidly and as we came opposite Heart island a very pretty sight greeted our eyes. It was a building looking much like a castle of olden time, "when knights and dragons held their sway." The whole was lighted with tiny electric bulbs till it looked like a fairy palace. The owner is the proprietor of the Waldorf Astoria in New York and on an island near by he has a large poultry farm from which he supplies his own hotel.

We reached Morristown at 8:30 and still had a drive of six miles before us, finally arriving at home about 10 o'clock.

Dog Feeds Brother Dog

Stories are often told of a dog's faithfulness to his master, but here is a story of a dog's faithfulness to a brother dog.

A man who owned a big ranch lost a collie dog for nearly a month and for several days searched the woods for it without success. One day he tossed a bone to another collie. Instead of gnawing it, the dog picked it up and started for the woods. He kept turning his head as if to see whether his master were coming, and his owner decided to follow him.

The dog trotted along for a mile and stopped at an old well. Then he dropped the bone over the edge of the well. The man, who had followed close behind, got a ladder, climbed down and found the dog that had been lost.

There were only about two inches of water in the well, but the dog that had fallen in would have starved to death if it had not been for the kindness of his fellow dog.

"Johnnie," asked his teacher, "can you give us a sentence, using the word 'income' in it?"

Johnnie hesitated a moment; then replied:

"Yes'm: 'The boy opened the door and in come a cat.'"

Elaborate New Editions

Hans Andersen's Fairy Tales, illustrated by W. Heath Robinson. This is one of the most elaborate and beautiful of the season's books for children. It has sixteen full page plates in color and over a hundred line drawings. Mr. Robinson is an artist of extraordinary charm and it's safe to say that Hans Andersen has never been given such exquisite interpretation. The printing is excellent and the binding beautifully simple. [Henry Holt and Company, New York. $3.50 net.

Mother Goose: The Old Nursery Rhymes, illustrated by Arthur Rackham, is another of the magnificent gift books for children that makes the older generation wish it could live its childhood over again. Arthur Rackham is justly celebrated as an imaginative artist and he has never appeared to better advantage than in these lovely Mother Goose pictures—twelve full page ones in color and innumerable black and white sketches. This is easily the most delightful "Mother Goose" ever published. [Century Company, New York. $2.50 net.

The Children's Blue Bird, retold from the play of Maurice Maeterlinck by Georgette Le Blanc (Madame Maeterlinck); illustrated by Herbert Paus. Pure enchantment, both in text and pictures, for Madame Maeterlinck knows just how to be simple in telling this loveliest of fairy tales and Mr. Paus has supplied illustrations in color and black and white that are nothing short of perfection. Quite young children will be able to enjoy it. The binding is exquisite and it is astonishing for a volume of such lavish beauty to sell so cheaply. [Dodd, Mead and Company, New York. $2.50 net.

The Jungle Book, by Rudyard Kipling; illustrated in color by Edward Detmold. To a great many people this will be the "find" of the season. Smaller than those books already mentioned, it is fully as elaborate because of the extreme richness of its binding, pictures, decorative margins and beautiful typography. The artists are two Englishmen of stunning ability and they've made Mowgli and Grey Brother, Bagheera and old Baloo and even Kaa look "just as they ought to." The rich tones of green decorating every page suggest the cool depths of the jungle. This is a wonderful piece of work. [Century Company, New York. $2.50 net.

The Wind in the Willows, by Kenneth Grahame, illustrated in full color by Paul Branson, People who know this whimsical animal fantasy will be eager to own this wonderful edition and those who don't know it had better begin at once. It has an undisputed claim to the word "classic"; it has the Carroll charm and something of the manner, but it has more of the mysterious alchemy we call literature than "Alice." Mr. Bransom's color plates are beautiful, showing plainly that he understands the interesting Rat, the Mole, the Badger and, above all, the spirit of Pan. The pictorial cover is notably artistic. [Charles Scribner's Sons, New York. $2.50 net.

The Story of Chanticleer, retold from the play of Edmond Rostand by E. M. Hann; illustrated by J. A. Shepherd. That this remarkable play should now be accessible to children is one of the joys of the book season. The adaptation has been made by one who knows the richness of M. Rostand's poetry and whose exquisite choice of language will make the children feel it. The illustrations, many of which are in lavish colors, are simply inimitable. Altogether a joy and a delight. [Frederick A. Stokes Company, New York. $1.50 net.

Gulliver's Travels, by Jonathan Swift; illustrated in color by Milo Winter. A very attractive octavo edition, not so elaborate as many others that have been published, but extremely satisfying in every respect. The illustrations are charming. One wonders how it's possible to publish a book of this sort at so low a price. [Rand, McNally and Company, Chicago. $1.20 net.

Gulliver's Travels, by Jonathan Swift; with introduction by W. D. Howells and illustrations by Louis Rhead. This edition boasts no colored plates, but Mr. Rhead's black and white are wonderfully conceived and Mr. Howells's foreword is of interest. The typography is especially attractive. [Harper and Brothers, New York. $1.50.

Nicholas Nickleby, by Charles Dickens, retold for the children by Alice F. Jackson; illustrated by F. M. B. Blaikie. One wants to call this an "adorable" edition, and it literally is. The retelling is well done, the incidents are well chosen and the colored pictures simply charming. [George W. Jacobs and Company, Philadelphia. 75 cents net.

Robinson Crusoe, by Daniel Defoe; illustrated by Elenore Plaisted Abbott, is published in the "Washington Square Classics" and is as appropriately illustrated as is any edition we've ever seen. Miss Abbott not only has a vivid imagination but a sense of color that is riotously and gorgeously tropical. The child who can read "Robinson Crusoe" for the first time in this edition is fortunate. [George W. Jacobs and Company, Philadelphia. $1 net.

Ivanhoe, by Sir Walter Scott; illustrated by E. Boyd Smith. This is a very handsome volume, fortunate in having Mr. Smith as its pictorial interpreter. His color sense is vivid and the richness of the "Ivanhoe" background gives him a splendid opportunity. Decorated and boxed. [Houghton Mifflin Company, Boston. $2.50 net.

The Arabian Nights, edited by Frances Jenkins Olcott; with colored illustrations by Munroe Orr. A beautiful edition based upon Edward William Lane's version, containing several of the more uncommon stories. Miss Olcott's excellent editing, expurgations and additions make this a fine standard edition. The cuts are charming. [Henry Holt and Company, New York. $1.50 net.

The Treasure Book of Children's Verses: An Anthology, edited by Mabel and Lilian Quiller-Couch; illustrated in color by M. Ethelred Gray. A new popular edition of this well-chosen collection of poetry for and about children. The colored plates are essentially English but wholly delightful. [George H. Doran Company, New York. $2 net.

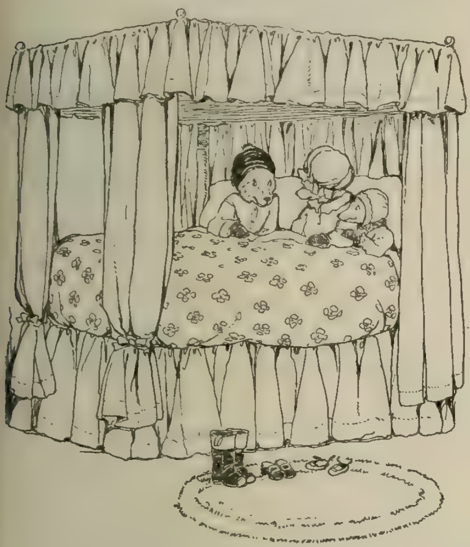
Heidi, by Johanna Spyri. A beautiful holiday edition of this famous German classic, with sixteen full-page illustrations in color by Charles Copeland. Its story is of Heidi, a poor girl who lived with her hermit grandfather high up in the Alps. Her words of Christian hope and comfort bring peace to many unhappy people and lead her grandfather back to God. The book can be unhesitatingly commended. [Thomas Y. Crowell Company, New York. $1.50 net.

Pinocchio Under the Sea, from the Italian of Collodi by Carolyn M. Della-Chiesa. The children's old friend, Pinocchio the marionette, again makes his appearance—this time on a tour of the seas, hoping to learn something of his father. A charming fantasy with interesting illustrations by Florence R. Abel Wilde. [Macmillan Company, New York. $1.25 net.

Three Distinctive Stories

Miss Santa Claus of the Pullman, by Annie Fellows Johnston. The author of the famous "Little Colonel" books has written a new book that may be prophetically classified as the season's most popular story. It has all the elements that readers of The Continent demand in the books they give their young people —sweetness, wholesomeness, the sturdy uplift that comes from examples of life finely lived and a spirit of Christmas zest that's enormously contagious. The action centers about two little people who make their love of railway journeys operate to their escape from a dreaded new stepmother; in the course of their "travels" they meet Miss Santa Claus, who has some beautiful things to tell them about some stepmothers, and then—but we shan't disclose it! A perfectly charming book and one that every child ought to find in his Christmas stocking. Reginald Birch supplies the illustrations, and everyone knows what that means. [Century Company, New York. $1 net.

Deering at Princeton, by Latta Griswold. This is the most ambitious of the year's college stories, and the most helpful as well as the most interesting to put into the hands of the boy who's thinking seriously of a college career. Planned rather on the scale of Owen Johnson's "Stover at Yale," it takes Deering through his course at Princeton, shows him making a wide assortment of friendships and struggling with the social order. It's full of ideas, but is written for a slightly younger audience than "Stover" and is thus more intimately inspiring to a boy reader. Excellently illustrated. [Macmillan Company, New York. $1.25 net.



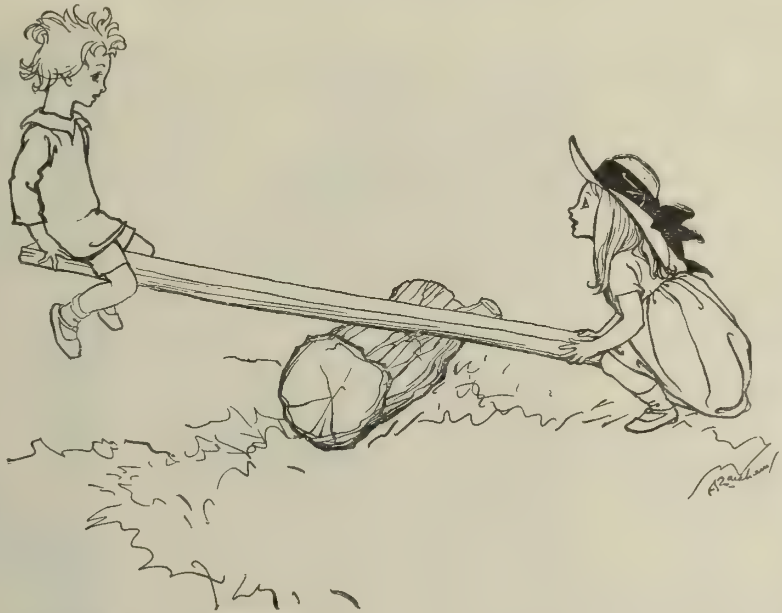
From "The Tippity-Flippitts"
Copyright, 1913, Little, Brown & Co., N.Y.

The Voyage of the Hoppergrass, by Edmund Lester Pearson, that delightful author of "The Believing Years." Here is the most rousing, ingenious, whimsical and humorous adventure story written in years—a sort of new "Treasure Island" in which an old catboat, a kindly sea captain and a group of hearty modern boys are substituted for Stevenson's more elaborate material. It's a wonderful cruise they have, and one which marks Mr. Pearson as a genius in the art of boys' stories. For the boy who wants adventure this is the season's richest offering. The very attractive line drawings are by Thomas Fogarty. [Macmillan Company, New York. $1.50 net

Verses, Jingles, Novelties

Blossoms from a Japanese Garden, by Mary Fenollosa, with colored illustrations by Japanese artists. A ravishingly dainty combination of Japanese verses and Japanese prints, a beautiful thing to stimulate interest in the little people of the enchanted islands. It can be read to quite small children and is certain to be treasured by older ones. Both author and artists are real poets and their book is something entirely new. [Frederick A. Stokes Company, New York. $1.50 net.

The Irish Twins, by Lucy Fitch Perkins. Already famous for her charming books about Japanese and Dutch twins, Miss Perkins need have no fear as to the reception of her new one. These two little Irish people and their old Grannie Malone make a most interesting story. The author's illustrations are as clever as ever. [Houghton Mifflin Company, Boston. $1 net.



From Arthur Rackham's "Mother Goose" Copyright, 1913, Century Co., N. Y.

The Mary Frances Sewing Book; or, Adventures Among the Thimble People, by Jane Eayre Fryer; illustrated by Jane Allen Boyer. A gem of a book to interest small girls in sewing, and best of all it's really quite like a fairy tale. It has stories and poems and diagrams and directions and patterns and the loveliest pictures you can imagine. No girl can resist it; she can learn to make anything from dolls' clothes to party dresses for herself, and the thing appears to be comprehensive enough to keep her happily employed for a year. [John C. Winston Company, Philadelphia. $1.50 net.

The Railroad Book, by E. Boyd Smith, is based upon a delightful idea—that of visualizing the fascinations of travel. Children will learn a great deal about trains and railroads from the text and the stunning full page colored plates that accompany it. Bob and Betty have the adventures of their lives in the diner and the mysterious sleeper. [Houghton Mifflin Company, Boston. $1.50 net.

The Kewpies: Their Book, by Rose O'Neill; illustrated by the author. The Kewpies have become an institution and it's a joy to have another book about them. They seem more radiantly philosophical than ever this year and even more bewitching. Each page has its large picture in color and corresponding verses. [Frederick A. Stokes Company, New York. $1.25 net.

The Animal Rainy Day Scrap Book, by E. L. and E. T. Shuman. Here are hordes of photographs of animals, each of which is to be cut out and inserted in its proper place. The scheme is ingenious because the search for the "proper place" will be attended by the acquisition of real knowledge about animals. [Reilly and Britton Company, Chicago. $1.25.

The Boy's Book of Pirates and the Great Sea Rovers, written and illustrated by George Alfred Williams. Probably this is the most satisfying book about pirates ever produced—from the boy reader's point of view. It has colored pictures of lurid interest (they're quite remarkably done) and a running account of pirate exploits that makes the hair stand on end. [Frederick A. Stokes Company, New York. $1.

Daddy Do-Funny's Wisdom Jingles, by Ruth McEnery Stuart. Daddy is an old "down South nigger" who sings in a happily philosophical way about all the interesting happenings on the plantation. Mrs. Stuart is without a peer in this field at present and these jingles of hers reflect the old-time South very wistfully. The pictures are by G. H. Clements. [Century Company, New York. $1 net.

The Ballads of the Be-Ba-Boes, by D. K. Stevens; illustrated by Katherine Maynadier Daland. The Be-Ba-Boes are fascinating creatures with no legs, fashioned like those toys that can be knocked in any direction without ever losing their balance. In this very attractive book they have some amusing adventures. [Houghton Mifflin Company, Boston. $1.50 net.

The Torn Book, by A. Z. Baker, and The Tumble Man, by Hy Mayer, are two laughable novelties that will be enjoyed by the children who liked Peter Newell's "Hole Book." The first one has limericks and interesting torn pages which reveal part of what's to come on the next page; the second has humorous verses by Charles Hanson Towne which supplement the colored pictures showing the little bouncing-ball man who creates such terrible havoc. [D. Appleton and Company, New York. Each $1.25.

From "The Story of Chanticleer"
Copyright, 1913, Frederick A. Stokes Co., N. Y

The Goop Directory, by Gelett Burgess, tells about all the naughty Goops who do the disagreeable things usually attributed to small children. There are full page pictures of each performance, and youngsters will enjoy it and perhaps mend their ways a bit. [Frederick A. Stokes Company, New York. 50 cents net.

Boys and Girls, by James W. Foley, is composed of verses in dialect much in the vein of Riley or Field, but with an individuality of their own. Suitable for children to memorize and recite or for their elders to enjoy. [E. P. Dutton and Company, New York. $1.35 net.

Sonny Boy's Day at the Zoo, by Ella Bentley Arthur; illustrated by Stanley Clisby. Sonny Boy is a real little person who visited the New York zoological park and had his picture taken with his animal friends. It's all told about in verses and cunning photographs. [Century Company, New York. 90 cents net.

The Brownies' Many More Nights, by Palmer Cox. Another Brownie book—which is almost too good to be true. It's as inventive as the former ones, too, and has pictures on every page. [Century Company, New York. $1.50.

Flossie Fisher's Funnies, by Helene Nyce. Interesting silhouette pictures which tell stories, followed by blank pages on which the child may record what he imagines the story to be. [Frederick A. Stokes Company, New York. $1 net.

Fairy Tales and Fancies

The Patchwork Girl of Oz, by L. Frank Baum. When Mr. Baum announced that the marvelous land of Oz was henceforth to become invisible and cut off from communication with the outside world, a perfect groan went up from his young readers and he was besieged with letters begging him to revoke that awful edict. One small child (obviously a resourceful person) suggested that he establish wireless communication, so Mr. Baum proceeded to get in touch with Dorothy by wireless and this is the record of the latest Oz doings thus reported to him. Lavishly illustrated. Reilly and Britton Company, Chicago. $1.25.

From "Blossoms from a Japanese Garden"
Copyright, 1913, Frederick A. Stokes Co., N. Y.

The Pipes of Clovis, by Grace Duffie Boylan, is worth special notice when one goes to select Christmas gifts, for it's a fairy romance quite different from the ordinary type. Clovis is a shy creature of the woods, a forester's son, who has a magic pipe upon which hang the fates of nations. There's a touch of history linking the story up with the reign of King Karl of Swabia, but otherwise the interest is purely fantastical. It's the most engaging and glamourous fairy adventure story of the season. [Little, Brown and Company, Boston. $1 net.

The Strange Story Book, by Mrs. Andrew Lang; edited by Andrew Lang; with illustrations in color by H. J. Ford. A typical Andrew Lang book in some ways and in others quite different from anything to which his name has been attached before. It contains the weirdest, most mystical and altogether the queerest collection of tales ever got together. Mrs. Lang furnishes a beautiful preface in which she explains her husband's magic personality for child readers. [Longmans, Green and Company, New York. $1.60 net.

When I Was a Little Girl, by Zona Gale, was reviewed in the issue of Nov. 13, so that the grown folk would be sure to see it, but it must be mentioned again here so that none of the young ones will miss it. Its audience will be those older children who like whimsical stories of childhood's imaginative life. Beautifully illustrated. [Macmillan Company, New York. $1.50 net.

The Mouse-Colored Road, by Vance Thompson; illustrated by Oliver Herford. Unusually distinctive and beautiful, this story tells of some children who manage to "slip between the atoms of time" and make friends with famous children of history. One of these is the little shepherd who first saw the star of Bethlehem. [D. Appleton and Company, New York. $1 net.

The House with the Silver Door, by Eva March Tappan, contains three original fairy tales—the one mentioned in the title, "King Hansel the First" and "The Star Princess." Miss Tappan is too well known as a writer for children to need any added praise here—except the mention that her book ranks high among the season's fairy literature. [Houghton Mifflin Company, Boston. $1 net.

Fairy Frolic, by Enos B. Comstock; with pictures by Frances Bassett Comstock. A bewilderingly gauzelike company of fairies and elves whose little games are told about in simple rhymes. With numerous black and white sketches and exquisitely fanciful full pages in color. [Rand, McNally and Company, Chicago. $1.20 net.

The Hungarian Fairy Book, by Nandor Pogany; illustrated in color and black and white by Willy Pogany. There is unusual interest here, for collections of Hungarian fairy tales are rare. Besides the very attractive illustrations by this celebrated artist there are marginal decorations in red. [Frederick A. Stokes Company, New York. $1.35 net.

Wonder-Oak, by Bertha Currier Porter, has all of the good old-fashioned fairy tale atmosphere and begins enchantingly, "Deep in the wood the great white oak stood tall and motionless." Its trunk is covered with sparkling ice, but inside it's hollow and forms the castle of the fairy king and queen. Very charming. [Methodist Book Concern, New York. $1 net.

The Rose Fairy Book, with twelve plates in color and drawings by Lilian A. Govey. A compilation of the best fairy tales from all nations, handsomely illustrated, decorated and bound. [George H. Doran Company, New York. $2 net

Twilight Town, by Mary Frances Blaisdell, is for boys and girls from 6 to 9 and tells of the twilight hour in the nursery when all the toys are set free by a fairy so that they may play with one another. The language is very simple, the type large and there are many illustrations. [Little, Brown and Company, Boston. 60 cents net.

The Children of the Shoe, by E. M. Jamieson. These children belong to the Old Woman who lived in a shoe and they go out into the world to seek their fortunes. Delightfully written and illustrated by Tom Browne. [Methodist Book Concern, New York. 75 cents net.

Genuinely Informing

The Book of Indian Braves, by Kate Dickinson Sweetser, is a very interesting collection of stories about famous Indian chiefs and their thrilling exploits. There's Powhatan, Osceola, Sequoyah, King Philip, Joseph, Sitting Bull and Pontiac—all of them drawn vividly. The illustrations in color and half tone are by George Alfred Williams. [Harper and Brothers, New York. $1.50 net.

Under Greek Skies, by Julia D. Dragoumis, and In Sunny Spain, by Katharine Lee Bates. These two volumes begin a new series whose aim is to acquaint children with the kind of life little foreign people lead before they immigrate to this country. Miss Dragoumis is widely celebrated for her studies of Greek life and Miss Bates knows Spain exhaustively. Both are illustrated. [E. P. Dutton and Company, New York. Each $1 net.

Wonderful Escapes by Americans, edited by William Stone Booth. An unusually valuable collection of narratives built around our most famous early adventurers. Each story is supposedly told by the hero himself, so that the young reader feels a more intimate interest than in a bare recital of the facts. Illustrations in color and black and white. [Houghton Mifflin Company, Boston. $2 net.

This Wonderful World, by Agnes Giberne. The main object of this admirable book is to interest children in the making and uses of commonplace things — to arouse a curiosity which in after years may lead to a deep knowledge of this wonderful world of ours. The pictures are from photographs. [American Tract Society, New York. $1 net.

The Boys' Life of General Sheridan, by Warren Lee Goss. A readable and authoritative biography of Sheridan by the author of "A Life of Grant for Boys and Girls." There are several maps and many full-page illustrations. [Thomas Y. Crowell Company, New York. $1.50.

The Child's Book of American History, by Albert F. Blaisdell and Francis K. Ball, is especially designed to interest children of from 10 to 15 years. Its stories are written in an appealingly dramatic style, yet the facts are neither distorted nor exaggerated. [Little, Brown and Company, Boston. 75 cents net.

Historic Adventures, by Rupert S. Holland. Romantic adventures from American history told in a way to interest boys especially. It opens with the French and Indian war and continues through the revolution, the Indian wars, the war of 1812 and the civil war. [George W. Jacobs and Company, Philadelphia. $1.25 net.

The Quest of the Fish-Dog Skin, by James Willard Schultz, takes the young reader over a long Indian trail, full of stirring adventure and Indian legend. Well written and full of information, giving a vivid idea of the early dwellers of our West. [Houghton Mifflin Company, Boston. $1.25 net.

Heroes of Indian Mutiny, by Edward Gilliat. Stories of heroic deeds, intrepidity and determination in the face of fearful odds during the great mutiny. Stirringly illustrated. [J. B. Lippincott Company, Philadelphia. $1.50.

The Story of the Early Sea People, by Katharine E. Dopp. A highly informing account of prehistoric Denmark, designed for older children. Profusely illustrated. [Rand, McNally and Company, Chicago. 75 cents net.

Scribner's New Book Store

The tourist who means to "do" New York thoroughly must now stretch his itinerary to include a trip to 599 5th avenue, where he may visit what is one of the world's most delightful book stores. It has been completed during the past summer and Messrs. Charles Scribner's Sons are responsible for the achievement. A Chicagoan has described it vaguely but with a peculiar aptness as "an affair of golden harps," and it's true that in design, coloring and atmosphere it produces a sort of "golden age" feeling. One can go into transports over the literary treasures its well stocked shelves and tables hold—over its rare editions, its exhibition gallery, its admirable methods of displaying books that deserve particular notice; but over and above all this stands out the feature of supremest interest—that here at last is a book store designed with the same care and imagination and taste that go into the making of a beautiful home.

"I knew you were homesick, Magsie."

"How? I never told you."

"You did in your sleep sometimes. And by what you said when you sent me home to my mother. So I just took a little side trip and bundled up this one and brought her along."

"He did not give me time to bring a trunk," said the grandmother, laughing in gentle happiness.

"Just as well, mother. There would be no place to put it!"

The baby slept and they drew close about the fire. "Now I want to know all about it," commanded Joe.

"I want to know what brought Mr. Frink 'way out here in all that awful cold," said Maggie. "You said you would tell, Mr. Frink."

"Yes," answered the sheep herder, who had taken but little part—save turkey-part—in the fellowship of the happy hours. "But that there 'mister' kind o' knocks me out. . . . Well, I'll tell you best I can, only there's some things won't bear tellin'. They're like these here little snow stars that light on your coat out o' the sky. You can look at 'em, but if you bring 'em in out o' the cold or lay a finger on 'em they ain't there. . . . I shipped my sheep ten days ago an' got my pay an' there was a time ahead—you know, Joe? Sheep herders and their wealth is soon parted. I set out seven times at least to hit the trail fer the Glad Hand. Do you think I got there? Nary time till it was beef extract I was after. Only place to git it an' I don't know of anything like it —fer such as her—to start up the circ'lation in a hurry. Didn't know what I'd find here. But that's ahead a piece. . . . I jes stuck around my cabin an' in my bunk, day after day, with that roll o' bills humpin' theirselves fer the Glad Hand. But I couldn't go no more'n I could kick a bum lamb dyin' on the trail. All I could see was Mis' Ruthven, standin' in the blazin' sun, lookin' like the mir-rage an' askin' me did I drink coffee. She jes' stood there. Day an' night. Fer the rest . . . . well, it's this way. I've been with the sheep half a lifetime. It drives some men batty. But fer me I've always found a heap of comp'ny in the creeters an' the dogs, an' it's as good as books to steddy the skies an'—well, to steddy mos' anything you can see. There's a heap to see on these plains. While yer seein' yer listenin' an' learnin'. This is the snow-star part I was a-tellin' you of. When you've walked an' laid an' rode an' slept out in the still, you get so you see things that ain't there an' know things you ain't told. Savvy? So, when I kep' seein' the wife, smilin' in the hot sun when it was plumb 40 below and goin' some—I knew. An' then I hit the trail. That's all. . . . Wisht I'd 'a' minded sooner. But I can't explain it—can you?"

The grandmother, sitting next to Pete, laid a hand on his arm. "Yes, Peter Frink, I can! I've never lived on the plains away from people and I've never been without wood in a blizzard, thank God. But I've lived! My girl knows that. And I explain it this way, Peter Frink." Her voice was tremulous with deep conviction as she continued with words throbbing out of the heart of the Book that the sheep herder had not looked upon nor heard of nor thought about for long, dark years. "'O Lord, thou searchest out my path and my lying down and art acquainted with all my ways. . . . If I take the wings of the morning and dwell in the uttermost parts of the sea, even there shall thy hand lead me. . . . The darkness hideth not from thee.' It was God, Peter Frink, who would not let you go to the Glad Hand, who spoke to your ready heart and sent you through the blizzard to build a fire for my child."

"It was God," repeated Joe softly, drawing Maggie's head down upon his breast.

"Yes, it was God," said Maggie, "I asked him."

There was a long silence. Then Pete, leaning forward, quietly knocked the ashes out of his pipe and spoke in a voice and with words that welled up from the manhood still burning deep within him. "Yes. I reck'n 'twas Him. There ain't no way such things is explained but that way. . . . Well, I've et Thanksgiving like a Christian this year and I've got yer little woman to thank fer it, Joe. She plumb broke me up with her little Christian doin's first time I struck this here ranch. . . . It's sure been a Thanksgiving, good people —old-time kind. . . . Do you know it's most midnight? If you'll jes' let me have that there lantern I'll hit out fer the barn, though I'm warmer than I've been"—and he held out his hand to Maggie and looked into her honest, clear, glad eyes—"than I've been since I quit bein' a tenderfoot! A good Thanksgiving! Good night!"

Ruth is very fond of using big words. Sometimes she gets them right and sometimes she doesn't.

"I had a pretty bad fall yesterday on the consecrated sidewalk in front of the new church," she recently told another little girl. "Why, I was unconscientious for two whole hours."

The other little girl is still wondering just what she meant.

MISSIONARY WORK

Another Voice from the Heart of Africa

Monsieur Edouard Jacottet is another missionary from Africa who has come to England and is now being heard there with almost as much interest and zest as Dan Crawford aroused when he arrived from Africa more than a year ago. Monsieur Jacottet is a Swiss gentleman who has been working in Basuto Land, South Africa, for the Paris Evangelical Mission Society. England is interested in him because he speaks delightful English and because the field of work he charmingly describes lies beneath the British flag.

Comparing his birthplace and his present home, he declares that Basuto Land is the Switzerland of South Africa. Like the Swiss, the Basutos remain to this day an unconquered people. Their country has indeed become a part of the British empire, but has become so by their own consent and not by hostile conquest. The British resident commissioner living in Maseru is the only representative of British power living within the confines of the country and he governs entirely through the tribal chiefs. Defended on all sides as they are by the Draken mountains, the Basutos owe their present happiness to the good fortune that neither gold nor diamonds have ever been discovered within their territory. The great wave of fortune seekers rushing through South Africa has therefore passed them by and left them to cultivate their secluded valleys.

The most remarkable feature of the semicivilization which these native tribes have developed is the fact that the land of the whole nation is owned in common by the people. No one pays rent and no one pays taxes, save an insignificant poll tax. To every native coming to the age of self-support the chiefs assign a certain holding of land which he is entitled to use for his lifetime. If he fails to farm it properly, however, his tenure is forfeited.

The Basutos raise a considerable variety of cereals, but their industry is mostly in the line of raising cattle, sheep and goats. Private personal property is fully recognized and many of the native farmers enjoy comfortable wealth. Many live in modern homes, fitted up with modern furniture. The sale of liquor is prohibited throughout the country, and there is in consequence practically no poverty. Such poverty as exists is taken care of by the families of the unfortunate poor. Family ties are so strong that the fines visited upon the very occasional misdemeanors in the country are usually paid by contribution from the defendant's relatives. The sole currency for paying fines or any other obligation is cattle.

Monsieur Jacottet believes tremendously in the possibilities of the Basuto nationality. He even anticipates the development of a genuine native literature among them. One of his own pupils has already written a romance called "The Pilgrim of the East," which has been published, and another novel not yet in print, which the teacher believes rivals in power Rider Haggard's work.

It is just eighty years ago now since the principal Basuto chief of that time, Mohesh, heard from a passing trader of white missionaries who had a new message to preach to the black races. The old chief immediately collected 300 cattle and started a drover with them to Cape Town under orders to buy three missionaries. The unhappy drover, however, lost all of the purchase price en route because a gang of white raiders stole his cattle from him. But the news of the incident came to the ears of Protestant missionary secretaries in Paris and the three missionaries desired were dispatched from there. The result of the work thus begun is a Christian church numbering 100,000 members in a total population of half a million and exercising a dominant influence over the whole body of the people.

Woman's Federation Perfects Plans

At a recent conference in New York City plans for the Federation of Woman's Boards of Foreign Missions of the United States were given definite form. Five territorial commissions—four in the United States and one in Canada—are to center in the cities of San Francisco, Chicago, Nashville, New York and Toronto. Two representatives from each commission, together with a representative from the central committee on united study of foreign missions, form a general advisory commission. Organization of all the territorial commissions except Canada was completed during the spring of 1913 and the representatives appointed by them met in New York City to complete organization of the general commission.

The function of the commission is to connect the woman's boards with the territorial commissions; to stimulate united prayer and study and a spirit of fellowship; to extend interdenominational effort; strengthen summer schools already existing; form new centers; encourage uniformity of plan in college, school and young people's work; develop work for children, and promote united study of missions.

The central committee on the united study of foreign missions was invited to become affiliated and a conference committee was named to meet with a similar committee from the Council of Women for Home Missions. The commission approved the adoption of the "coronation pin" and recommended that Friday of the Week of Prayer be observed as a day for united prayer for foreign missions. Mrs. Henry W. Peabody and Mrs. William A. Montgomery were accredited as the representatives of the Federation of Woman's Boards on their trip around the world.

Officers elected are: Chairman, Mrs. DeWitt Knox; vice chairman, Mrs. Oliver R. Williamson; secretary, Miss Mabel Cratty; treasurer, Mrs. William I. Haven.

Wanted – For Heroic Service

The Cartagena and Sinu river region of Colombia, South America, needs immediately a consecrated married minister—a man who, first of all, is sure of his Bible; one who can be cheerful in the midst of discouraging surroundings; who can sympathize with and love ignorant, unlovely, warm-hearted people; who can travel uphill and down, by land and water and in mud and dust; not controlled by nerves or temper. His wife must be even better. This region has a population of 300,000 souls, ready to welcome anyone who seems to offer something better than they have known. Scores of the towns have no resident priest. The country is rich and beautiful, the opportunity for Christian work boundless. A friend offers to furnish the money; the board is ready to commission the workers. Who will respond to this urgent call? Communicate with Dr. Arthur J. Brown, 156 Fifth avenue, New York City.

Taking a Church Census in Tokyo

The Fukuin Shimpo, an important journal published in Tokyo, prints a report of a special investigation made by members of its staff into the present status of the Christian congregations of that city. It has been alleged by some critics of missions in Japan that the attendance of Japanese on worship in their capital city is less today than it was ten years ago. But the investigator for the Shimpo declares that this is not true as a general proposition, although it is admitted that in certain churches audiences show a very material falling off. There are eighty Protestant houses of worship in Tokyo. The representatives of the Shimpo visited nineteen of these and counted the audience. The average congregation was found to be 108. The largest congregation was found in the Presbyterian church of Fujimicho, where there were 308 worshipers. The Congregational church of Hongo had 202 persons present. The Azuba Methodist had a congregation of 260, but here as in Holy Trinity and in two or three other places, the audience was augmented by students required to attend under the rules of their institutions. Elsewhere, audiences ranged from seventy down to thirty.

On the basis of these observations, the Shimpo calculates that on an average Sabbath morning 5,000 Tokyo citizens are listening to Protestant sermons. This means one out of every 400 citizens going to church each week.

The Fukuin Shimpo criticises the preaching in much the same terms the Americans are used to hearing American sermons depreciated. The majority of the discourses dealt with social and moral questions, and the newspaper declares the lack of "deeply spiritual sermons fitted to make a strong impression on the souls of the hearers." It urges more preaching of doctrine and more analysis of present-day spiritual problems. It is observed that the churches where the preaching is good are the churches that have the largest attendance.

Apparently the idea that religion is a special interest of women does not prevail so largely in Japan as in the United States. The Shimpo remarks, "There is some tendency for the women to outnumber the men," which is certainly a milder statement than anyone would be likely to make of American churches. But even a "tendency" of this sort is not altogether reassuring.

Chilean Students in Revolt

"The students are in revolt again and they are having nightly celebrations and meetings of protest against the government, which has literally bowed submissively to Rome and exculpated the internuncio.

"This time their slogan is 'La separacion de la iglesia del estado,' a long step taken forward in that direction as a result of their agitation and canvassing of public men.

"So you see we are not inactive here, even if progress is not always the outcome of our activity. I am in a position where I can obtain the sentiment of the young men and women of tomorrow and they have begun a real earnest crusade in favor of liberty. Meanwhile we shall help it along by every well-advised means and stimulate the youth who have never undertaken any serious moral problem yet."

So writes a fellow worker regarding a matter which may prove to be the needed stimulus for bringing about in Chile the long desired separation of church and state. Something like two years ago the papal delegate came to Chile and negotiated the sale of some conventual property and carried off the proceeds to Rome. This was not to the liking of the liberal element, who think that conventual as well as church property in Chile should be retained for Chileans. So when the delegate returned to Santiago a few months ago he received a different greeting from what he had expected. The students from the University of Chile and their sympathizers gathered at the railway station and made it exceedingly uncomfortable for the prelate. Then they demanded of congress that legislation should be passed to prevent any further disposal of church or convent property without special permission of congress. J. F. GARVIN.

Board Notes and Announcements

—"The marvelous things accomplished through love" Mrs. Bryan Y. Craig illustrated Friday morning at the Board of the Northwest, Chicago. At the suggestion of Mrs. Keep, prayers were offered for Mexico, especially that wisdom might be given to the officers of our government in relation to that republic. Reading a letter from Mrs. McKean of Chieng Mai, the Siam secretary spoke with grateful appreciation of the devotion of missionaries who work where they cannot be well. The first letters received from Mrs. A. B. Carr of Africa, Miss Florence Murray and Miss Emma Campbell of Persia were read by their corresponding secretaries. The China secretary had letters from Miss Schaeffer and Mrs. Melrose of Hainan, Miss Ellington of Changteh and Mrs. Throop of Soochow. The Korea correspondent reported the transfer of Mrs. Alex Pieters from Seoul to Chai Ryung. A letter from Miss Leavitt of Tanabe, Japan, was read by Mrs. Shumway.

—Among the welcome calls received at the Board of the Northwest this week has been that of Mr. and Mrs. James F. Garvin of Chile and their daughter Ruth. Their sister, Miss Lila Garvin, reached Japan in safety and is now at home in Onomichi, an outstation of Hiroshima.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

Everyday View of the Lesson

By J. L. Scott

Lesson Text, Joshua 5:10—6:27. Golden Text, Mark 9:23: All things are possible to him that believeth.

The River Jordan has witnessed two great revivals, one under Joshua and the other under John the Baptist. The two were similar in that each marked a new beginning in a nation's life. Israel had become a backslider. For forty years circumcision and the passover had been neglected. Should the Presbyterian Church fail for the next forty years to hold a communion service or baptize a child, its position would be similar to that of Israel at the crossing of the Jordan. There are those who urge that these services are only a form, but no church can long survive without them. When one becomes careless about the communion he usually becomes equally so about what the service stands for.

Israel had observed the passover the night it left Egypt and also at Sinai, but not since. Nomadic Christians are very liable to suffer a religious loss. The average church roll today includes many transients. The number carried on it bears little relation to the actual attendance. The people, like the Israelites, are camping out somewhere in the desert where even the most vigilant pastor fails to find them.

Revival of Israel Under Joshua Has Religious Significance

But Joshua would revise the roll. The passover became a living service, and circumcision was restored to Israel. It was a memorable time in the history of the people. The reproach that had rested upon them was lifted and a revived nation looked out upon a new future.

A revival suggests a previous life. In this instance it recalled the past and made possible a better future. The monuments erected at the river crossing had also a sacramental significance—they were reminders of what God had done, a showing forth of his care. The revival of Israel under Joshua belonged to an age of war rather than to an age of peace. Under its inspiration the armies fought for a cause as well as for conquest. Joshua was essentially a religious warrior. In the light of modern times the terms are contradictory. Our wars are political. The religion of either side forms no factor in them. But it was not so in the East. There war was virtually a foreign mission enterprise. Joshua invaded Canaan for the one purpose of driving out not only the heathen but heathenism as well. Force was the only argument he knew. He fought with the weapons in use at the time.

God Seldom Accompanies Commandments with Reason for Them

In discussing the morality of the Old Testament wars one must remember the civilization of that age. Every century is a step in the stairway of history, and Joshua stood not far from the bottom. Civilization is not a fiat but an evolution. It began with an idea and developed into what it is. As for God's part in those terrible wars, the question is above human discussion. That the Judge of all the earth can do nothing wrong we all believe. He who "taketh up the isles as a very little thing" is not to be weighed in the balance of man. The more we attempt it, the more we demonstrate our folly. The Bible is full of the inexplicable, but so is life. The commands of God are seldom attended by the reason for them. When Joshua stood before Jericho there appeared to him a man with a drawn sword. And in reply to the question, "What saith my lord unto his servant?" there came the answer, "Put off thy shoe from off thy foot; for the place whereon thou standest is holy." The vision was special, but the lesson is universal. We must wait and listen.

Joshua had been commanded to conquer the land, but the city of Jericho lay across his path. It was well fortified and should have been capable of strong resistance, but his vision, the captain of the Lord's host, superseded him in rank and took command of the army. Who this man was no one knows; possibly the Son of God himself, anticipating the more literal incarnation yet to come. His method of warfare must have seemed strange indeed to a soldier like Joshua. Instead of using battleaxes, engines and ladders, he was to compass the city, bearing the ark and trumpets, for seven days. The conquest was to be one not of force but of faith. Things that bore no relation to each other were to appear as cause and effect. The number seven was to play an important part—seven priests, seven trumpets, seven days. Against these stood the towers and walls of a fortified city. It was a test of Joshua's faith. Moses with an outstretched rod, thinking to turn back the tides of the sea, was in the same position.

Joshua Obeys Command and Walls of Jericho Fall

Joshua obeyed his captain. For six successive days he marched about the city; an hour and a half possibly was required to complete the circuit. On the seventh day the demonstration was changed. From sunrise to sunset the strange procession wound about the city until the completion of the seventh circuit, when the people gave a great shout and the walls fell. The destruction was complete. Everything had been placed under "ban," or reserved for God, so there were no spoils. One person, Rahab the harlot, with her household was spared because of her kindness to the spies. She subsequently became a mother in Israel—the wife of Salmon, the father of Boaz, and an ancestress of the Christ.

Jericho has been made a type of the human heart; fortified by the powers of sin, it surrenders not to force but to faith. In that sense this lesson becomes personal as well as historic. But whatever may be its significance, it marked a revival in Israel, a return to the form and spirit of the worship of the years before.

The Lesson Verse by Verse

By Hermon D. Jenkins

ANALYSIS—The conquest and occupation of Palestine involve only such ethical questions as we face every day. God often accomplishes his purposes for his people by what seem inadequate means. The fall of Jericho was the presage of the occupation of the whole land.

When we study the invasion of Palestine by the Israelites, the ethical question confronts us, Why should God cast out one race to put another in possession of its land? To this we may answer, In the first place, the occupants had won their title to it by the sword, just as the Turks won their provinces in eastern Europe. Had the Turk been thrust out 300 years ago civilization would have been the gainer. If we rejoice to see Moslems thrust back from the lands they have long devastated, we need hardly shed tears for the Canaanites, who had won in war what they lost in war.

In the second place, the Canaanites were a race so imbruted and degenerated that they have not to this day done anything to advance literature, art or religion, while the Jews have produced and still produce many of the finest minds of the race. The Canaanites produced nothing worthy of or even capable of surviving, while the Jews have given to the world, by God's grace, those fundamental principles of theology and morals which lie at the root of civilization. A race, intellectually and morally degenerate, was turned under by the plow that the field might be sown with a worthier seed.

In the third place, it was in accord with a weeding out process which is still going on, whereby any nation that will not serve God is bound to perish. The Iroquois claimed all the lands in North America east of the Mississippi river. But such was not the purpose of God in the creation of this continent. Unless we are prepared to condemn all civilization we cannot condemn the white man's occupation of a continent which the Indians would neither cultivate nor sell. The head hunters of Borneo and the Igorrotes of the Philippine islands must either get in the procession or be trampled under by its onward march. What happened to the Canaanites is happening every day. A modern writer says that in America we have immured in various penal establishments a larger population than the swords of the Israelites swept from Palestine, and many of them at least for lesser crimes.

God Chooses the Weak Things to Confound the Mighty

Verse 8—It has always seemed to the world that the weapons of our spiritual warfare were far from sufficient for the conquest of a race. At the opening of the campaign Jehovah gave encouragement to Israel by showing how he could, without their aid if he chose so to operate, take the strongest of the cities that defied them. Jericho appears to have been the key of all western Palestine, and it was built upon an elevated plateau (Dr. Sellin, 1909), surrounded by walls of a character to impress and demoralize the invaders. No cities in Egypt were so amply protected and the Israelites were not by birth or experience as soldiers fitted to take walled towns.

Verse 9—Nevertheless they obeyed the command of their leaders, even while it exposed them to some peril. They knew not at what moment the defenders of Jericho might make a sally and swoop down upon them. It is probable that the inhabitants of the city thought the Israelites were resorting to some sort of incantation, and so dared make no sortie.

Verses 9-10—The mystery of their proceedings made a profound impression on the defenders of the city. The blare of the horns and the silence of the people—what did it mean? They could not understand it. It got on their nerves and prepared them for a grand stampede when anything decisive should occur.

Verses 11-14—One of the most imperative of Christian graces is resolution, ability to hang on, to stick to it instead of wishing, as most of us do, to do and be done with it. The army was an army of young men, and Joshua had yet to prove them. These six days gave him an opportunity to test them. He began to discover those upon whom he could rely and to find out those who were turbulent, morose and restive under new conditions.

Physical Causes of the Overthrow Ordered of God

Verse 20—The walls of the city fell down at the shout of the people, at the precise moment when such a fall would indicate a divine purpose. We are not told whether to regard the event as a miracle or as a result of natural forces whose foretelling alone was miraculous. The writer was once in his youth at the dividing of the ways, hesitating as to his course, when he received a letter written by a friend who had never written him before and who knew nothing about his mental conflict, but which gave just the advice he needed. And that advice, under God's direction, has guided all his intervening years. Dr. Lange used to say that many events which we call natural were supernatural in their coincidence with spiritual crises, the man and the hour appearing together, as in the Swiss clock the door flies open and the cuckoo emerges as the bell strikes.

But the walls fell. That was enough. The breach in Canaanitish defenses was made and the Israelites had now the courage to go on. Upon their occupying this land the future of the race, under God, depended. The destruction of the city wall was such as oft accompanies an earthquake, whose motion, instead of being simply up and down, is often circular, strewing solid objects over a wide area, as grain is strewn from the swinging hand. The conquest of the land was practically assured when its richest, best protected and most populous city fell without the drawing of a weapon or the flight of an arrow.

Let me but do my work from day to day,
In field or forest, at the desk or loom,
In roaring market place or tranquil room;
Let me but find it in my heart to say,
When vagrant wishes beckon me astray,
"This is my work; my blessing, not my doom;
Of all who live, I am the one by whom
This work can best be done, in the right way."
Then shall I see it not too great, nor small,
To suit my spirit and to prove my powers;
Then shall I cheerful greet the laboring hours,
And cheerful turn, when the long shadows fall,
At eventide, to play and love and rest,
Because I know for me my work is best.
—Henry van Dyke.

DEVOTIONAL SERVICE

BY EDWARD ARTHUR WICHER

Week Beginning November 30, 1913

FOREIGN MISSION TOPIC—The Islamic world —Syria, Persia and India.

The Islamic world extends over Turkey, Persia, Egypt, North Africa and parts of Central Africa, India and China. The followers of Mohammed number about 195,000,000. The experience of Christian missionaries has given rise to the conviction that Islam, of all the ethnic religions, offers the most obstinate barrier to the propagation of our faith. There is a certain blindness in Islam that makes its devotees inaccessible to reason, a certain brutality that renders them impervious to the attractiveness of gentleness, a certain arrogance that makes them contemptuous of the religion of Christians, whom they still regard as their conquered foes.

Perhaps the spectacle of the utter failure of some of the earliest foundations of Christianity and of the implacable hatreds existing between ancient Christian churches, has had much to do with the hostility and contempt of the Moslem for the Christian missionary. It has been sound policy on the part of the mission boards to endeavor to purify and revitalize the ancient Christian churches existing in Mohammedan lands before attempting directly to convert the Moslem world.

The very virtues of Mohammedanism, its doctrines of the oneness and transcendence of God, of his sovereignty over the universe, are in themselves hindrances to the immediate acceptance of Christianity. Why should they accept a religion of which, as they conceive it, they already hold the fundamental principles, without the admixture of illogical ideas? Mohammedanism itself is a great missionary religion, continually pressing into new territory and conquering other beliefs, especially in equatorial Africa.

Our church has missions on Islamic territory in Syria, Persia and India. The whole Islamic world has been in a state of unrest during the past year owing to the two great wars in which Turkey has been defeated. But in spite of all disturbance the work of missions has gone steadily forward. In some respects the events of the year have been favorable to missions. The breaking up of the old system has led many of the more enlightened Moslems to question the soundness of their basis of life. At any rate it is the testimony of the board that more men in Syria were inquiring about Christ and Christianity during the first six months of 1913 than in the preceding six years.

The sanitarium for patients suffering with tubercular disease conducted by Dr. Mary Eddy has steadily grown in importance. During the past year it has held sixty-seven patients for longer or shorter periods. The indirect results of this work are wide reaching. Some of the patients, whose cases were beyond hope when they entered, have given convincing and joyful testimonies to their faith in Christ before they died.

During the year a theological seminary has been organized in connection with the Beirut station. The veteran missionary, Franklin E. Hoskins, D. D., has been chosen the first president, and a new building, Colton hall, has been erected close to the campus of the Syrian Protestant College. A class of nine young men entered theological studies in the seminary last year.

The Mission Press in Beirut has been busy as ever. It prints tracts, periodicals and Bibles, which are disseminated as widely as the Arabic language. Seventy-five per cent of the work done is the printing and distributing of the Scriptures, of which 85,172 volumes were sent forth in 1912.

Besides Beirut, our mission has also the following stations: Lebanon, high up in the mountains southeast from Beirut; Tripoli, on the seacoast fifty miles north of Beirut, where both the shore city and the inner town are occupied by our people, and where we have two flourishing schools, one for boys and another for girls; Sidon, the ancient Phœnician city, thirty miles south along the shore of the Mediterranean.

There are three great Christian colleges which are among the foremost agencies in the transformation of the life of the Levant. They are Robert College at Constantinople; the Syrian Protestant College at Beirut, and the college of the United Presbyterian Church at Assiut, Egypt. These colleges are training the leaders of tomorrow for both Turkey and Egypt.

Our church is responsible for the evangelization of North Persia, with 5,000,000 inhabitants; and yet we have only two ordained missionaries to carry on the work in this entire territory. The opportunity today in Persia is the largest that has been afforded to Christian missions since the rise of the Moslem power.

In our East Persian mission more Moslems are being reached than hitherto. In Teheran a prominent physician, a convert from Islam, has publicly addressed a large audience upon the "only remedy for the leprosy of sin." Though a large number of Moslems were present, the occurrence caused no disturbance and aroused no opposition.

In our East Persian mission there are engaged fifteen men missionaries and twenty-one women missionaries, including the wives of the missionaries. The number of communicants added during the year was thirty-six, making a total number of 378. In our West Persian mission there are thirteen men missionaries and twenty-two women missionaries, including the wives of missionaries. During the past year there were added 132 communicants, making a total membership of 2,987.

In India is the largest body of Moslems in any single country. It increased from 19 per cent of the population in 1901 to 21 per cent in 1911. Reports from the field indicate increasing numbers of Mohammedan visitors at the Christian services. Most of the converts from Islam have to endure hardships for the confession of their faith in Christ.

Let the weakest, let the humblest remember, that in his daily course he can, if he will, shed around him almost a heaven. Kindly words, sympathizing attentions, watching against wounding men's sensitiveness—these cost but little, but they are priceless in their value. Are they not almost the staple of our daily happiness? From hour to hour, from moment to moment, we are supported, blest, by small kindnesses.—Frederick William Robertson.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S SERVICE

COMMENTS IN BRIEF BY WILLIAM T. ELLIS

December 7, 1913

DOES RELIGION REALLY PAY?

TOPIC—The ideal Christian. XII. His rewards. Psalm 1.

Pay day proves whether or not the position is worth while. The day of dividends determines the value of the investment. The rewards of religion are the one real test of its worthwhileness. This topic faces the truth that the Christian is to be rewarded.

They get most out of religion who put most into it.

The old psalmist pictured the righteous man as a tree. The analogy is interesting. The tree that succeeds is the growing tree, it is blessed with life. And life, full, forceful, unhindered life, is itself a reward. Such a tree bears fruit or gives shade. It is life with an output. The recompense of a holy life is the fruit of holiness. No account can be kept of the travelers who are sustained and sheltered beneath the shade of a good man's life. In the nature of things it is impossible for any person to be rewarded by an exact knowledge of the good he does in the world. That sort of bookkeeping has to be left to heaven.

Little children may be rewarded with a stick of candy, but as they grow older the rewards they prize most are less tangible and material. The word of approval, the smile of favor, the bestowal of companionship, the gift of love—these are the most valuable forms of recognition. So it is with the rewards of the Christian. Simply to merit the Master's "blessed" and to be conscious of his approval is itself a goal of holy living. We want less the gifts of the Lord than the favor of his face. To please God is to win the richest reward.

There is a new commercial talking machine in the market that is fairly mysterious. It does away with the old wax cylinder. Instead there are some three miles of sensitized wire. The dictator may record his words in the privacy of his office and in another room at her convenience the secretary will transcribe them. But the most marvelous part of the mechanism is the way by which, by pressure on a button, the electric fluid cleans those wires of speech so that they may be used over again and an entirely new record written upon them. That is like the gospel truth of forgiveness, which is the Christian's first reward. In a way that we cannot understand the mighty electric force of the divine Spirit wipes out the record of sin. The past is blotted out. The life is given a fresh start. For the forgiven man all things are made new. The life that once answered to unrighteousness now answers to holiness. That is the reward of the gospel of grace.

The success which abides and stands all the tests of the searching white light of publicity here and hereafter is that of a holy life which has ministered to the world. Not every Christian is a success in the way he planned; but no man ever kept faith with God and his fellows and then registered failure. He may die poor and unknown, but he has won the sort of success which pleases the angels.

A holy life is its own reward.

A current slang phrase speaks of certain persons are "dead ones." The figure is graphic. There are doubtless many persons walking our streets who are dead to all that constitutes real life. On the other hand, the Christian has inherited that royal promise of the Saviour, "I am come that ye may have life, and may have it more abundantly." He is, in the slang phrase, a "live one." He abounds in vitality. His is the power of an endless life. Amid men he lives the life that is even now eternal. No anæmic, impoverished creature he, for in his spirit wells up the very fullness of life.

A charming story by Mrs. Burnett called "The Secret Garden" tells how several persons entered into new happiness and vitality through their experiences in the garden of which the world knew nothing. The tale suggests the phrase, "a life hid with Christ in God." This secret experience of divine fellowship is one of the sweetest rewards of Christian living. This is the mystery and present reality of the Christian life.

The business of being a Christian is a long-time transaction. Its rewards are not always present and manifest, but they are none the less sure. As says the Italian proverb—"God does not pay every Saturday; but he always pays."

Nowadays it is not fashionable to talk about heaven. Yet when Jesus wanted to comfort his disciples he held up to them the thought of heaven. That has been the hope of saints in all ages. Frankly, life is an insoluble mystery if we may not reckon beyond the grave. It takes two worlds to make this one understandable. God has laid up in heaven immeasurable and ineffable joys for those who love him. The founder of the flower mission, a Louisville woman, was a shut-in. One day she laughingly complained to her pastor, Dr. Gerrant, that she seldom saw him. "Never mind, Jennie," was his quaint reply, "when we get to heaven I'll come and visit with you for a thousand years." The hope of the night is the morning. The eternal day is the promise for all travelers who find life's highway dark and dreary.

The Open Hearth

Two Fictions About Wedlock

I have read with great interest The Continent's editorial on "Marriage That Stands the Test." I think that nearly everyone will agree that hasty marriages are responsible for the greater number of unhappy unions and the cause of marriage would be better promoted by laws making it more difficult to marry than by laws making it difficult to be divorced. But there are a great many of us who cannot agree that, a bad union having been formed, it is our Christian duty to bear it in humility and fortitude. We would rather indorse King Arthur, who says to his unfaithful wife:

"I hold that man the worst of public foes
Who either for his own or children's sake,
To save his blood from scandal, lets the wife
Whom he knows false abide and rule the house."

Theologians and legalists have alike erred in seeking a solution for this important social question. Legalists have treated marriage as a matter of legal fiction similar to other contracts; theologians have treated marriage as a matter of religious fiction. As a matter of fact it is neither, but is a reality and antedates either religious or legal institutions.

Your argument assumes a spirit of honor in both parties to the marriage. If this assumption were true there would be no need for divorce legislation, but unhappily the assumption is not true. The vow to God and state then becomes a sacrilege and there is more morality in squaring things, even if it is necessary to start over again, than there is in sanctioning legal concubinage.

W. H. L.

Only a Full Gospel Is Sufficient

The Continent is one of two papers that are sent after me every week in my tours about the earth and its first page editorial is the central dish in the feast. I have not missed one of these great editorials since I first tasted their quality, and not until Oct. 23 did I find a flaw in their compelling logic. But in that issue your minor premise is surely wrong, and your conclusion most harmful, as I believe.

You say truly that the gospel is sufficient for everything, including social regeneration. That is your major premise, and it is grandly true. But your implied minor premise, that the gospel is the transforming of individual characters only, is most unscriptural, and so your conclusion that legislation for social benefit is not a part of the gospel, but a vain substitute, and that the thorough conversion of many individuals is the one sufficient means of correcting our social ills in city and country, is fatally erroneous—indeed one of the chief obstacles to social regeneration, and the most harmful heresy that was ever held on a large scale by devout men.

It is a surprise to find in your fearless pages this sixteenth century reaction against too much politics in religion, which is now the favorite and plausible excuse of timid preachers and laymen who fear to lay their hands to unpopular reforms and so smugly comfort themselves by saying, "All that is needed to moralize society is to evangelize individuals."

This false conclusion is based on the popular definition of the gospel, which is as different from Christ's definition as a seed is different from the full-grown, fruit-laden tree. The gospel of Moses, Isaiah and Christ as found in the 4th chapter of Luke is based on the "jubilee of social justice," which Isaiah said would come every year when Christ should come dominantly into human life. That is "the good news to the poor." First of all, Isaiah and Christ set before us the living seed of individual conversion as the seed of the gospel, "the Spirit of the Lord is upon me," and no one more than the Christian social reformers with whom I work emphasizes the power of individual Christian character. Every moral reformer in the United States, so far as I meet them in a wide range of reform work, opens his meetings with prayer and song, and counts the Christian church the main army and especially the chief motor of social betterment. But those words of Isaiah and Christ, which your editorial and many sermons treat as the end of the gospel, is only its beginning.

Read on in Christ's definition. "He has sent me to comfort the broken-hearted, to preach deliverance to captives, and the opening of prisons to them that are bound." What does that mean? This is what it means: Blind asylums, prison reform, emancipation of slaves. The individualist rationalizes this great promise down, in his skepticism of God's power in social reform, into mere figures of what happens in individual conversion, which only gives right motive and leaves us to educate and organize men of right motive in Christ's name to change social conditions.

To plant the seed in the heart is no more the full gospel than planting seed while neglecting weeds is full farming. "Get right with God" is the first commandment, but the second is like unto it, of like importance, and to receive like attention—"get men right with each other."

WILBUR F. CRAFTS.

Problem of Church Statesmanship

A matter came up at a recent meeting of the San Francisco Presbytery which is of importance to the Home Mission Board and may find duplication in other presbyteries. The chairman of the home mission committee called attention to a group of three mission churches which have for years been a source of debate as to the wisdom of continuing these fields.

The oldest of these fields is that of Memorial church, in our "butchertown." Its boundaries are very definite. On the east and north are railroad yards and slaughter houses, on the south and west are Italian garden tracts. In the last three months the pastor has made an exhaustive study of the constituency. He found ten families of Presbyterian preference, forty Methodist, 180 Lutheran families and eighty-six families who declared they were not Catholics. In the same district were 1,150 Catholic families. There is a large Catholic church, a Methodist church and Presbyterian.

Memorial church dates back over forty years, all of which time it has been on the board. After this long period of service with an altered constituency and a greatly decreased parish on account of the industries crowding in, we find only ten families and but one family actually interested in the work of the church. This one family asks only for a united Protestant work. The church building itself is in sad decay and the church erection society will immediately have to put in at least $1,500 if the work is to continue. The Methodist Church has been in the field less than ten years, but with a regular resident pastor they have forty families.

Those actually familiar with the past work and conditions proposed that inasmuch as there was manifestly room for but one Protestant church presbytery confer with the Methodists with a view of withdrawing in favor of the other. The Methodists have signified a willingness to buy the property. Furthermore it is patent that the growth of the Methodist Church in this field demonstrates that this is their logical parish.

The matter was put to a vote and seemingly carried. However, those opposed called for a show of hands. The question was reopened and laid on the table. The facts, however, remain. The whole matter suggests that in San Francisco Presbytery there is at least one field and possibly more where a disinterested prudential committee would see worthier uses for the money so laboriously collected in our churches for missions.

With so many real calls in our own city and all over the country $50,000 might readily be saved if such a disinterested pruning committee could go over the fields now kept alive by mission money. Such churches as Memorial if continued could be bound to another church as their mission school and church.

A Cup of Cold Water

It is not merely the increasing temporal provision that the church is making for their old age and disability that is heartening the ministers of the gospel. Beneath all of this is the comforting assurance that the church is being baptized anew with the spirit of the Compassionate Christ.

The Forward Movement of Ministerial Relief and Sustentation is a cup of cold water in the name of Christ to many of His faithful servants. It will not lose its reward.

Is your Thanksgiving sentiment real enough to enable you to provide a cup of cold water for the disabled minister, or for the desolate widow and the defenseless orphan?

In the name of Christ you will have your reward!

The Very Best of the New Novels for Christmas Gifts

"T. Tembarom," the latest work of Frances Hodgson Burnett, princess of story-tellers, is the kind of fairy tale of a real world that everybody loves. It is the story of a New York waif and newspaper reporter, suddenly confronted with the responsibility of a vast English inheritance; and it "is filled with a vast amount of human nature, with an invigorating worldly wisdom, with a sense of the goodness and badness in men and women, and with the ability to keep the reader continuously on the alert. For," to quote the Boston Transcript further, "Mrs. Burnett's skill is the skill of the born teller of tales."

Charles S. Chapman has illustrated the book delightfully and in an entirely new way.

Dr. S. Weir Mitchell's new novel, "Westways," a story of Civil War days, is a worthy successor to his "Hugh Wynne, Free Quaker," which has been given undisputed rank as the great novel of the American Revolution and one of the most brilliant and powerful novels of our times. It is a brilliant picture of American life, manners, and sentiments, at a period that was one of the most important in the development of the country; it is also a wonderful portrayal of the love of husband and wife, suffering deeply through honestly held, but diverse, opinions, yet holding the love of each for the other the greatest thing in life.

In "The Truth About Camilla" Gertrude Hall has written a novel of unusual distinction — the story of an Italian adventuress, whose days are crowded with color and adventure.

Eleanor Hallowell Abbott's little blue-and-white book, "The White Linen Nurse," will probably go to every nurse in the land on Christmas Day; but it is a love-story for every novel-reader, whatever his vocation.

In this her latest book, the author of "Molly Make-Believe" has achieved an idyllic love story out of the strangest human elements that were ever compounded in fiction. And in her own wonderfully characteristic way Eleanor Hallowell Abbott sets forth these faulty, lovely, unforgetable people, and their piquant situation, in a narrative that bites deep in its humanity and in its vivid revelation of true love in a strange setting.

Herman Pfeifer made the clever illustrations.

Every one of the many thousands who read that saucy and joyous little book, "The Melting of Molly," by Maria Thompson Daviess, will want to read the author's brand-new book, "The Tinder Box," a whimsical comedy, written with deliciously flavored sentences around the old mate-motif, from such a modern feminist viewpoint that every reader feels both charmed and challenged to the point of a personal response.

John Edwin Jackson, a Southerner, made the illustrations, and they have caught the spirit of the book delightfully.

If you want to send the invalid, or depressed friend — any age from fifteen to fifty — a package of condensed sunshine, let it be that delicious little book, Jean Webster's "Daddy-Long-Legs."

Every lawyer you know, and most men, would enjoy Frederick Trevor Hill's "The Thirteenth Juror." It is a man's book, full of man talk, portraying vividly the evils of a politically influenced judiciary and the injustice of law that is the tool of lawyers.

"Murder in Any Degree" is a collection of some of Owen Johnson's very best short stories, including the golfing classic, "Even Threes." A book all men like.

"I have tried in 'John Barleycorn,'" says Jack London of this grim, gripping autobiographical record, "to present the liquor problem from the human, personal side." He has written also a swift and impassioned story of adventure.

Ellis Parker Butler's "The Jack-Knife Man" is that happy combination of humor, pathos, and humanity that makes a book real and dear. It is the book, of all he has so far written, for which Ellis Parker Butler's name will be remembered.

Financial Situation

Reynolds Sees Bright Outlook—Commodity Prices Higher Nov. 1—Firms Show Faith in Physical Exercise for Employees.

Deposits in the Continental and Commercial Bank of Chicago, one of the largest in the country, on a recent day were $9,000,000 larger than on the corresponding day last year. The president, George M. Reynolds, has been quoted as optimistic with reference to a change for the better in financial conditions after the first of the year. He says that many institutions affected by flood or drought are being "carried" by banks, but that the fundamental situation seems to him sound despite the gloomy forebodings of some business men. Even the prospect of a severe struggle over the currency bill does not affect his view of conditions. On the fundamental proposition that bankers must not be forced into an investment in which they have no representation, he thinks bankers will not yield. He looks for an easy adjustment of other features of the bill on which there has been disagreement.

Prices Are Higher—The average person is more interested in immediate prices of things he has to buy in order to live than he is in discussions about the currency, although the latter may involve the future prosperity of a large portion of the population. Mr. or Mrs. Average Person has found the past few weeks that prices are no lower than the month previous. In fact, if they had bought the large assortment of articles which enter into the calculations of Bradstreet's in making up their index figure, they would have found that commodity prices have increased 1 per cent in this country. The prices are, however, 2.6 per cent lower than last November, but except for a year ago are the highest ever recorded for this time of year. In England, on the other hand, prices on Nov. 1 showed a decrease of 1 per cent. Butter, eggs and manufactured textiles figured in the higher prices in this country.

Cash Value to Exercise—The number of industrial institutions that are adopting health standards the Y. M. C. A. has long made familiar to the men of the country is increasing each month. The Chicago and Northwestern railway is out with an order requiring a higher standard of physical efficiency for the employees in the dining car department. The men will be examined twice a year to see that they are fit for their work. The National Cash Register Company compels its employees to take an hour's physical exercise each day, for which the company pays them regular wages. It is estimated that more work can be obtained from employees in eight hours with an hour's exercise than in nine hours without the exercise. A large express company in the South has a Y. M. C. A. physical director lead exercises for its office force twice a day.

Railway Carriage Is Cheap—In connection with the campaign to obtain permission to increase freight rates 5 per cent, the railways are issuing interesting information concerning the present cost of carrying articles of ordinary use. The roads charge $6 to transport a piano 1,000 miles. The average piano mover wants $5 to move it around the block. The roads now carry a pair of shoes 1,025 miles for 2 1-5 cents, and a suit of clothes 1,000 miles for 6 4-5 cents. The average cost of moving a ton of freight a mile is ¾ cent. In 1880 the cost was 1¼ cents. On account of the restrictions on revenues placed on the roads by governmental authority and the higher wages obtained by employees the lines are asking the increase in rates.

Clerks Will Lick Stamps—Probably the largest number of packages in its history will be carried by the post office department during December of this year. The first Christmas at which the parcel post rates are in effect is approaching. The department is preparing for it by requesting early mailing of parcels. Arrangements have also been made so that parcels will be stamped by postal employees with canceled stamps, saving a large amount of time. The person who mails the package will have only to give the clerk the money needed to buy stamps to carry all packages he mails, and the stamps will be affixed later.

Brief Bits of Business News—S. W. Straus, Chicago banker, says that it cost his firm $2,100, including large attorney fees, to collect "at the source" income tax amounting to $65 in two weeks' hard work.—The annual sales of Chicago firms engaged in the hide business amount to $20,000,000. The annual sales of leather amount to $72,000,000, or one-fifth of the nation's business and more than any other city in the world save Boston.

Town Bettered by Former "Terrors"

These are boys of Asheville, N. C., who, says Frank W. Ober, were "fairly raising the devil"—now they are raising the standard of the town's character. They are not only interested in playing ball, but in Bible study. For the men who lead their twenty ball teams also lead them in as many Bible classes in the Y. M. C. A. Condition of membership on the ball teams is regular attendance at Bible classes. This has been going on for four years. The president of the governing board of the boys was the leader of the "Terrors," a gang of boys of the "best families," who were in fact the terrors of the neighborhood. They were caught by the Y. M. C. A., by its basket ball and its baseball on the Bible class condition. There are now 165 boys in Bible classes. The police judge says that since the Y. M. C. A. have been acting as probation officers he has not had a single boy arrested. Then, too, lots of these boys have found their way to college, who were going to the dogs. They are the young leaders of business, teaching classes in Sunday school and busy in church work.

Polygamy Defended and Reaffirmed

BY J. TOOKER FORD

JOSEPH F. SMITH, head of the Mormon "Church" in Utah, spoke at the dedication of the organization's new building at Wrightwood and Sawyer avenues, Chicago, on Nov. 2. His address was a flinging of the Mormon glove in the face of Christian Chicago. He boldly set forth the peculiar teachings of his sect and brazenly defended its immoral principles. He declared that the founder of Mormonism, Joseph Smith, was a prophet of God as truly as any prophet of Bible times. He went so far as to say that to his mind "Joseph Smith had revealed even more wonderful truths in the Book of Mormon than could be found in any other book in the world." Moreover, "Jesus Christ made his last appearance to Joseph Smith as he did to the eleven disciples."

Referring to his large family (forty-three children) he said he did not know of any more noble or beneficent work that a man could do for the world than to help bring into the world a strong, well-made, healthy babe. He made no qualifying statement whatever as to the wrong done through adultery, polgyamy or incest. He defended polygamy by this side parry, "My wives [he had five plural wives] are as pure and noble and virtuous women as any in the world," and he excused his present habit of cohabitation with them by the exclamation, "My God! Would I be such a brute as to turn them out into the world after having solemnly promised to stay by and support them?"

He stated clearly the Mormon teaching concerning "celestial" marriages by the fervid query, "Shall I abandon these virtuous and true women who have been given me for all eternity?" This teaching, which is fundamental in the Mormon creed, was expressed with all the fire of an Old Testament prophet. He sanctioned the doctrine of polygamy not only thus by inference, but by pointing to the ancient patriarchs who were unreproved by God in having plural wives; then he made firm both his position as a prophet of God and the "system" which he was practicing, by affirming his personal holiness. He said solemnly, upraising his hand, "I never in my life have done wrong intentionally to any man in the world." This led to what he evidently wanted to impress very particularly on the audience, "and I want to say that never in my life have I intentionally done a wrong to any woman." An uneducated Roman Catholic to whom these words were repeated said in the honest simplicity of his heart, "Why, he's wronging everybody!"

One inference which the Mormon president intended to be drawn by his Chicago audience was that ultimately the people whom he represented would so multiply as to absorb the republic and the federal government. He alluded to the history of the Israelites in Egypt, their small number at first, their rapid growth, and the fear of the Egyptians that they would outnumber them and take possession of the land. Then he asked this seemingly innocent question, "If God tells us to go on and do this are we to be blamed for so doing?" Anyone at all acquainted with Mormon doctrines and claims could see under his entire address a purpose to publish and stand by the peculiar and abhorrent doctrines of the sect in which he poses as the mouthpiece of God.

World Missions in Oklahoma

Great enthusiasm is being manifested over preparations for the campaign for missions to be held in Oklahoma City, Okla., for fifteen days beginning Dec. 7. Dr. C. E. Bradt, who had charge of a similar campaign in Fargo, N. D., last winter, is in general command of the forces. Delegations will be sent to other cities of the state to carry the stimulus over the commonwealth.

Grape Nuts a Perfectly Balanced Food

No chemist's analysis of Grape-Nuts can begin to show the real value of the food—the practical value as shown by personal experience.

It is a food that is perfectly balanced, supplies the needed elements for both brain and body in all stages of life from the infant, through the strenuous times of active middle life, and is a comfort and support in old age.

"For two years I have used Grape-Nuts with milk and a little cream, for breakfast. I am comfortably hungry for my dinner at noon.

"I use little meat, plenty of vegetables and fruit, in season, for the noon meal, and if tired at tea time, take Grape-Nuts alone and feel perfectly nourished.

"Nerve and brain power and memory are much improved since using Grape-Nuts. I am over 60 and weigh 155 pounds. My son and husband, seeing how I had improved, are now using Grape-Nuts.

"My son, who is a traveling man, eats nothing for breakfast but Grape-Nuts and a glass of milk. An aunt, over 70, seems fully nourished on Grape-Nuts and cream." "There's a Reason."

One Way to Reach the Foreigner

BY ROBERT WALKER

THE STRANGER within our gates may present serious problems and difficulties to the politician and financier, even to the social worker, but for the church of Christ he really means responsibility and opportunity. Instead of going to the ends of the earth after him to deliver our souls from the burden of debt which Paul realized he owed to "both Greek and barbarian," the Greek and barbarian have come to us to collect their claims. If they do not demand payment, none the less does it remain our duty to settle it with them.

An Italian English Class in Green Street Mission, San Francisco

Here he is with all his needs, waiting to be taken in and made one with us. There may be no beauty in him—indeed, he may even be repulsive to us in many ways; his customs and habits may be very displeasing to our taste; in our judgment his ideals may be gross and mean—yet, indeed, is he our splendid opportunity. We believe we possess just what he should have in order to make him what God intended him to be; we acknowledge that we are his debtors until we put him in possession of the good thing God has intrusted to us to pass on to him.

How shall we discharge our duty? The initial difficulty, as I see it, suggests also the first step we ought to take. He cannot speak our language; until he has learned it he cannot communicate freely with us. There are very few in our churches who could not, if they would, help the foreigner to learn our language. By patience and perseverance, exercised under a deep sense of divine obligation, almost every Christian in the country could open up means of communication with the foreign-speaking immigrant.

American home. In larger places classes can be formed and, the point of contact once established, all the rest follows naturally. But the work must be undertaken only "in the fear of God," for so the patience required will alone be maintained. The advantage to the immigrant is evident to all, but the habit of study, the sacrifice that must be made by him and the encouragement he must have to stick at it until he succeeds, can be secured only by the determination of the teacher. This applies equally to the individual effort and to the classes which may be established in connection with our missions, but the result is invariably most cheering. The foreigner will respond to such interest in his welfare with a grateful affection that makes it easy to deliver the gospel message. The frequent meetings and talks while the lessons are being taught will also give opportunity for exercising an influence that will rarely fail to produce good results in forming character and impressing American ideals of Christianity and citizenship on the alien. Many years of experience, both in Italy and this country, enable me to speak with assurance on this subject.

In each country we have found the best of our church membership coming from English classes, where friendships have been formed that have proved fertile in spiritual results. The accompanying picture shows our last winter's class in connection with the Green Street mission in San Francisco. The back row includes workers and friends. The teacher is Mr. Blanpied, immigration secretary of the Y. M. C. A., who has given much assistance in this branch of the work, and secured the valuable aid of a number of university students who willingly give their time to teaching in the evenings. As an illustration of the principle mentioned above, I may say that almost every member of the English classes is ready to become a member of the church. Such work requires faith and great patience, for the process of instilling the principles of the gospel into the hearts of the immigrant is often as gradual as the teaching of the new language.

Ways of Working

Combine Social and Business

An interesting social event was recently held at LeRoy, Ill., church under the name of "The Round Up." The session desired a gathering at which the entire church would be represented. A basket lunch was first held, then the baby show under the direction of the cradle roll department. Then came the "rough riding." This was the entertainment feature of the evening and each department was held responsible for one number on the program. Philanthropy, patriotism, devotion, evangelism, society, missions, Bible study and education were represented.

The evening closed with "branding." The brand was a blue button on which appeared "I have subscribed to the LeRoy Presbyterian church, have you?" Over $500 was added to the annual income of the church.

Bible Baseball Is Profitable

Bible baseball is a healthy and profitable indoor game which can be used by Sunday schools, Endeavor societies or other organizations. Rules of the game given by Rev. W. H. Hubbard of Poughkeepsie, N. Y., are taken from The Expositor. The game can be made to include a review of the Sunday school lesson, a mission study book or other matter which has recently been studied by all concerned.

The rules follow:

Choose captains who will select teams or sides. Interest is increased if bases are indicated and players move from base to base as the play calls for.

Designate the section of Scripture or the lessons upon which questions are to be asked for smaller ones. Older and more advanced Bible students do not need this.

The pitcher is the one who asks questions. Batter is the one answering the same.

Each question is a pitched ball. Each attempt to answer is a hit if the question is correctly answered; a strike if missed. Three strikes put the batter out.

If the answer is nearly correct, but lacking in definiteness, it is a foul strike. It adds in-

The Offer Still Holds Good

For about a year we published the following offer on the back cover of "Men and Missions:"

That if any church which adopted our Duplex Envelope System, preceded by a thorough Every-Member Canvass (as outlined in the booklet of the Laymen's Missionary Movement, No. 1 Madison Avenue, New York) did not receive an increase in offerings to Missions, without any decrease in offerings for Church Support—

We would supply, without charge, envelopes for the next year—Single or Duplex.

In more than a year and a half there has been one single church to report that no increase followed the adoption of the Duplex System, although a thorough Every-Member Canvass was made. The pastor told us when he wrote to take advantage of our offer, that he was anxious to try again because he felt sure a second attempt would result differently. Apparently he was right. When the free supply was exhausted, the church placed its order for the third year.

The offer still holds good.

The Duplex Envelope System for the Church and the Robert Raikes Duplex for the Sunday School are both fully explained in "DUPLEX CHURCH AND SUNDAY SCHOOL METHODS"—64 pages, illustrated. Write for a copy and for free DUPLEX UNIT No. 39.

THE BOY WITH THE U. S. INDIANS

Fifth Volume of "U. S. Service Series." Profusely illustrated from photographs taken in work for U. S. Government. $1.50.

Each manuscript of this series is based on Government information specially furnished to the author, and rigidly examined at Washington. A good idea of a great field of National activity is given, and made thrilling by the heroism of those who do the work of "Uncle Sam." This is especially true of those engaged in work with and for the Indians—always a name to conjure with among boys.

Illustrated. Net, $1.00. Postpaid, $1.10.

Pathos, humor and excitement all have a place in this bright story for girls. Little Harmony Hale is distantly related to that brave patriot spy, Nathan Hale, and this adds an interesting historical touch added to the fascination of the unraveling of the plot.

NEW BOOKS OF EXCEPTIONAL INTEREST

This Wonder-World

By Agnes Giberne

Cloth, 15 illustrations, 212 pages. 12mo. Price, net, $1.00. By mail, $1.09.

Miss Giberne, who has a most fascinating way of telling boys and girls about the natural wonders of the universe, in this her latest book has taken up some of the substances found on our globe, and has treated them in a manner calculated, as she herself says, "to awaken a curiosity which in after years may lead to a deeper knowledge of this wonderful world in which we live."

Thekla: A Story of the Name

By Edgar Whitaker Work, D. D.

A dainty Christmas offering in two colors with page border. Rich onyx malachite cover and lining pages, with jacket of the same. 43 pages. Net, 25 cents. By mail, 30 cents.

Herein is an attractive setting of an historical story of the Apostolic age. Thekla, a beautiful maiden, heard the message of the Gospel from the lips of the Apostle Paul. She became a Christian and was cast out of her luxurious pagan home. The narrative of what followed is told in Dr. Work's poetic style.

Religious Education and the Public Schools

By George U. Wenner

New edition, revised and enlarged. Cloth, 191 pages, 12mo. Price, net, 50 cents. By mail, 56 cents.

In this volume Dr. Wenner presents the solution of the problem that confronts the American people in the matter of the proper relation between religious education and the public school. It is a timely and valuable treatment of a subject of the most vital importance to the welfare of the nation. The volume should be in the hands of every parent and teacher.

AMERICAN TRACT SOCIETY, - - - 150 NASSAU ST., NEW YORK

terest to change the pitcher with each change of batter.

Each question correctly answered entitles the batter to a base.

If others are on bases, each question answered by the one at bat advances those of his side already on bases one base.

Each batter has the privilege of trying for a home run by answering four questions in succession, providing he answers correctly the first one. Each answer entitles him to a base.

A ball is a question asked which is not clearly stated.

Credit is given for questions answered whether home runs are made or not, also whether any on bases reach home or not. But four answers are necessary at one inning for a home run.

A balk is failure of the pitcher to finish question begun, and advances those on bases one base each.

Fielding may be done in asking questions incidental to the one asked by the pitcher with a view to test the batter's knowledge and certainty as to his answer. But should these incidental questions not be germane to the main question, they constitute errors, one of which advances those on bases.

Three persons failing to answer questions puts the side out.

WILL HELP RURAL CHURCHES

At a meeting in Utica, N. Y., Nov. 17 there was organized the rural village church association of Oneida county and vicinity. The object of this association is to promote fellowship and cooperation among the churches of the region; to encourage and so far as possible to assist them in setting up and carrying out plans of community service; and in general to aid in realizing a more wholesome, a more satisfactory and a more spiritual life in the rural village and in the open country. The work is to be done through appropriate committees. A close relationship is to be maintained to the Oneida county Y. M. C. A. An annual conference will be held, together with such other meetings as may be best. Rev. Henry White of Clinton was chosen president and William C. Newton of Utica secretary-treasurer. The meeting was addressed by Professor F. A. Starrat of Colgate University, who spoke on "The Pastor and Community Education." He advocated the use of moving pictures as helpful in various lines. Dr. John Brown, international secretary of physical work in rural communities, spoke on "Rural Health, Sanitation and Recreation." He advocated a closer cooperation of physicians and the rural pastors and urged pastors to assume leadership in the things that count for the welfare of the community.

ianapolis Second Church Celebrates Seventy-ifth Anniversary—Unveils Tablet to Charter lembers and Famous Preacher.

NDIANAPOLIS—A pleasant event in the so- and religious life of Indianapolis was the cele- tion Nov. 19 and 20 of the seventy-fifth anni- sary of the organization of Second church, ch event occurred Nov. 19, 1838, under the lership of Rev. James H. Johnson. The first ılar pastor, however, was Henry Ward Beecher. organization with only fifteen charter members some difficulty in finding a minister. But after unsuccessful calls to other men Mr. Beecher onded, leaving his first charge, Lawrenceville, ., July 31, 1839. Under his vigorous, eloquent ership the church soon attained that influen- place in the life of the city which it has held since.

Second Church, Indianapolis

mong the names of former pastors familiar to byterians are Rev. Thornton A. Mills (1854- who became secretary of General Assembly's rd of Education; John L. Withrow, D. D., 3-76), and Arthur T. Pierson, D. D.

he formal exercises had been preceded by a s of eight lectures by the present pastor, Owen ies Odell, D. D., on the life of Beecher. The rical sketch was read by Elder T. H. Spann, se father prepared the sketch used at the fif- anniversary. Addresses were made by two the former pastors—James McLeod, D. D., 3-89) of Pittsburg, and Rev. Joseph A. Mil- (1890-1901) of Pilgrim Congregational church, ago. The pastor formally dedicated a bronze orial tablet containing names of the charter bers and "to the memory of its first pastor, ry Ward Beecher," which occupies a conspic- place on the south wall.

PECIAL MEETINGS FOR EVANGELISM

wa—Pastors of the city are doing the preach- at union evangelistic services at Boone.

ansas—Hoxie has recently been stirred as it not been for years by meetings under Evan- t Redding and the pastor, Rev. E. L. Hum- y.—Rev. B. H. Gregg, assistant superintendent ome missions of Kansas, recently held evan- tic services at Weir City.—Dr. E. S. Stucker ttawa has recently held union meetings at Osborne and is now at Glenwood, Iowa.—Simultaneous meetings have been held in eight churches of Ottawa, the pastors doing the preaching. Neighborhood prayer meetings were also held. Rev. C. C. Russell of Garnett and Rev. W. A. Powell of Lawrence assisted Rev. J. M. Douglass.—Ten colleges were represented by forty delegates at the recent conference of gospel team workers at Park College.

Nebraska—Six churches of Grand Island united for six weeks in special meetings under the leadership of Evangelists Lowry and Moody. A large tabernacle was used and 600 professed conversion. Dr. A. F. Ernst is Presbyterian pastor.

SUGGESTIVE ACTIVITIES OF MEN

Wisconsin—A conference and dinner of the ministers and laymen of Rice Lake and vicinity was recently addressed by Dr. J. T. Henderson, national brotherhood secretary.

Nebraska—At a recent meeting of the brotherhood of Beatrice such subjects as good investments, business honor and saving the first $1,000 were among the topics discussed.

Illinois—Three young pigs weighing forty pounds each, roasted by the men, furnished the main part of the eatables at a recent dinner of the men of Monticello church. There were 170 men present. Rev. M. C. Long is pastor.

Ohio—Dr. J. T. Henderson, national brotherhood secretary, recently addressed a union meeting of men of Mansfield at First church. In the evening a conference was held with the men of First church to talk over definite work.—A laymen's missionary conference was held Nov. 20 and 21 in First church, Mansfield. J. Campbell White was one of the speakers.—Synod's brotherhood committee met in Columbus Nov. 10 to set up a program for the synod's brotherhood convention to be held in February, 1914.—Men of Ashtabula church recently listened to a talk on Siam by the son of a missionary, who is in this country preparing to enter the ministry.

SOCIAL SERVICE NOTES

Protests Against Vice—The American Federation of Sex Hygiene, New York, is making a protest against the allurements to vice and drunkenness which are interjected into such a large number of the evening amusements open to a majority of the people.

Try Substitute for Saloon—Near Northwestern University settlement on the northwest side of Chicago has been opened a room to take the place of a saloon. It is supplied with Polish and Yiddish newspapers, billiard tables and chairs. Coffee is served. It is an effort of the settlement to replace the social features of the saloon.

Work Must Back Up Publicity—Greater cooperation between newspapers and church workers was recently urged by F. S. Raper, assistant city editor of The Dispatch, in addressing the federation of men's Bible classes of Columbus, Ohio. Mr. Raper, who writes the advertisements for Columbus churches, urged that the best results of these announcements are possible only when reenforced by personal work by the church members.

ARE YOU ON THE ROLL?

The League of Cooperating Continent Correpondents is a new organization among Presbyterians. It is formed for the mutual benefit of members of the church everywhere, from China to Oshkosh. Each member pledges to let others know of new ideas in church work, and of events which will stimulate and encourage others in religious activity. The cost of enlistment is a 2-cent stamp—or a postal card. Applications and news items should be sent to The Continent news editor. Isn't there something that your church is doing which if known generally would encourage others?

Helps Every-Member Canvass

Dr. Walter M. Irwin, synodical superintendent of missions for Kansas, has recently issued in connection with the campaign preliminary to the every-member canvass a folder showing the growth of churches in Kansas and their contributions to various boards.

Correction

Through a typographical error the announcement of the Schauffler Missionary Training School, Cleveland, Ohio, on the back cover of The Continent for November 13 read $10,000 instead of $100,000—the much needed fund for a new building and for the extension of this institution's splendid missionary service. Full information about this deserving work can be secured from Mrs. Mary W. Mills, 5111 Fowler avenue, S. E., Cleveland, Ohio.

WHY
The American Standard Bible
(Edited by the American Revision Committee)
Is Best for the Sunday School

The exact thought of the sacred writers is given in readily understandable language in this version, thereby making its sacred teachings not only clearer to the young folks, but infinitely more interesting—every reading makes more Bible students.

The American Standard Version is used by the International Lesson Committee in the preparation of the Uniform and Graded Lessons, and by the leading Bible Scholars of the United States.

Even the English scholars say it is the best—Read what The London Quarterly Review says: "It is a noble work, destined to become the accepted Bible of the majority of the Anglo-Saxon race; and we are tempted to wish that it might be adopted as the one final revision of the English-speaking world."

Because of the great demand the publishers have issued it in over 200 different styles to meet every need. Prices from 35 cents to $50.00. Just send for sample pages and price list to

A LOOK AHEAD
WITH THE CONTINENT FAMILY

"Now we know that you white people are the worst brand of humans that ever trod the planet. For you have dared unblushingly to tell us that you killed the very Best One that ever trod this earth. And astoundingly not content with that, and not ashamed of it, you have crossed the sea 2,000 miles to tell us that you did it."

Dan Crawford

Twenty-three years ago left England quietly, and alone has worked in the heart of Africa telling the natives of the saving gospel of the Cross. During the few months since he has returned, for a time, to civilization probably no man in the Christian church has been so widely discussed. Thousands have heard him at summer conferences and evening meetings in cities this summer and fall. All have marveled at the intellectual vigor developed by this voluntary exile, separated a thousand miles from other white men for over two decades.

An article by Mr. Crawford, telling some of his experiences, will appear in The Continent next week. The quotation at the head of this column was fired at the missionary by a native chief, at the close of a sermon. It suggests some of the startlingly novel ideas crowded into his article.

The publication of this contribution by Mr. Crawford carries out the policy of this paper of getting for members of The Continent family the best thoughts of the best thinkers of the day. There will be other special contributors of note in the same issue.

Mr. Crawford's article can be read only in The Continent. In the same number will be news of the acts of modern apostles in all parts of the country.

AFTERNOON MEETING DRAWS STRANGERS

Germantown Church Starts Innovation to Reach Non-Church-Goers—Evangelistic Street Meetings in Auto Truck.

PHILADELPHIA—First church, Germantown, one of the largest in the city, having nearly 1,400 members, Dr. W. B. Jennings pastor and Rev. Theron Lee assistant, in an effort to solve the problem of Sabbath observance and worship by the whole people has introduced a "Pleasant Sunday Afternoon" service. It is informal and varied to meet the needs of the nonchurch-going masses. The first meeting was addressed by Dr. Cheesman A. Herrick, president of Girard College, the second by Dr. W. B. Forbush, author of "The Boys' Life of Christ." Of the 400 present at the first service not more than one-third were from the congregation of the church.

Personal Notes—W. G. Landis, general secretary of the Pennsylvania Sabbath School Association, addressed the November meeting of the Presbyterian Superintendents' Association in the Harper Memorial church on "Around the World with the Sunday School." Rev. W. H. Crothers of Logan, Utah, also told of Sunday school work in the Mormon country.—George Long of Inasmuch mission is holding evangelistic services from an electric truck at prominent street points.—A luncheon and reception was given by the Reformed Ministerial Association to Rev. Rufus W. Miller, who attended the recent international congress on alcohol at Milan, Italy, as an appointee of President Woodrow Wilson.—Rev. I. Mench Chambers, pastor of Merchantville church, has received the degree of D. D. from his alma mater, Lafayette College.—Rev. C. A. Blanchard, president of Wheaton College, Illinois, has been added to the force of teachers of the Bible conference now being held in this city.

Brief Items — Professor Edward B. Pollard of Crozer Seminary in an address on eugenics before Presbyterian ministers favored teaching sex hygiene. He asserted that one marriage in every twelve in this country ends in divorce; that Japan alone leads us in the disgraceful procession.—Vesper services have been held every Sunday afternoon during October and November in First church, Dr. E. Y. Hill pastor.

Deplore Sabbath Desecration—The annual meeting of the Lord's Day Alliance of Pennsylvania was held in the Y. M. C. A. rooms Nov. 18. Dr. L. Y. Graham presided. The general secretary, Dr. T. T. Mutchler, made a report. Rev. H. L. Bowlby, general secretary of the alliance of the United States, told what that organization is doing to preserve the observance of the Sabbath and Miss A. E. Wilson reported what the Pennsylvania W. C. T. U. is doing through its unions. The apathy and inconsistency of many church members in reference to observance of the Sabbath was greatly deplored.

Republishes Continent Article—The Board of Ministerial Relief and Sustentation has published in a leaflet "Should Protestant Ministers Marry?" by Marion Harland, which appeared a short time ago as a contributed article in The Continent.

Many Men Join Church—Gaston church, Walter B. Greenway, D. D., pastor, enjoyed an unusual attendance at a communion service on a recent inclement Sunday morning. Nothing like it has been observed in the church's history. The church auditorium was filled, as was also the ladies' parlor adjoining. Of the large number of new members received thirty were adults, fourteen being men.

Hold Meetings in Homes—Rev. E. R. Simons's pastorate in Second church, Camden, opens encouragingly. Evangelistic services have been preceded by simultaneous house meetings in nine different places.

REVIVAL SPIRIT IN SAN FRANCISCO

Churches Hold Meetings to Attract Non-Church-Goers—Richmond Dedicates New Building—Oakland Has Novel Club.

SAN FRANCISCO—Revival spirit is taking possession of churches on both sides of the bay. Howard church is engaged in a district evangelistic campaign. Trinity church has been celebrating old members' week and special evangelistic meetings have been carried on. In Oakland all the denominations have been separated into evangelistic groups by the federation and a fall series of services will be held by the churches of the different localities. In Berkeley ladies of the churches have organized a federation of their own. Mrs. Hubert Bryant of St. John's church is president.

Richmond Church Dedicated—The church at Richmond, which is the most northerly of the east shore cities, was dedicated Nov. 9. Rev. Guy Arnett White is pastor. A number of former pastors and members of presbytery participated.

Novel Club with Big Plan—Boosters of Oakland First church have organized a novel club which is called the "Anti-Do-Nothing Club," with the following pledge: I agree to make an earnest effort to secure three persons who will each agree to secure three new members for the organizations of the church, and in addition I agree to secure three new members; these new members all to be secured by Friday evening, Nov. 28, 1913, at which time all the members of the organizations will join in a reception and Thanksgiving service in the parlors of the church.

Organize Italian Church—Great rejoicing is being made in Presbyterian and Congregational circles over the first success of their interdenominational work among the Italian population. Green Street church, which was turned over to work for that nationality in September a year ago, under the charge of the Rev. Robert Walker, has now an Italian Christian organization established. Nov. 18 a church organization of sixty members was formed by Mr. Walker, assisted by President W. H. Landon of the San Francisco Seminary and Rev. Charles F. Aked of First Congregational church. A simple confession of faith in Christ was received from all those who accepted membership. Presbyterians vie with Congregationalists in making this joint work a splendid success.

Brief Items—Olivet church, which recently released Rev. W. E. Parker, Jr., to become associate superintendent of church extension in Chicago Presbytery, has called Rev. W. C. Spaan of Mountain View. The new pastor is a graduate of San Francisco Seminary and has had successful pastorates in Crescent City and Mountain View.—O. H. L. Mason, D. D., of Los Angeles Presbytery, for the present will make his home in Oakland.—Josiah Sibley, D. D., of Knoxville, Tenn., is being listened to with suspicious interest by Calvary congregations while spending a short vacation in San Francisco.—Professor E. A. Wicher is acting as general supply for Westminster until a new pastor is obtained. Professor Wicher has been commandeered several times for week-ends for that tact-requiring postion in bay city churches.

Has Bible Study Week—Pledge Sunday anniversary was observed at Berkeley First church, Lapsley A. McAfee, D. D., pastor, by the inauguration of a Bible study week. Three sessions were held each day of the week. In November, 1911, $46,000 was pledged and this is now nearly paid. A mortgage burning is shortly due.

LIQUOR MEN FIGHT SUNDAY MEETINGS

Council Grants Permit for Tabernacle Despite Opposition—Churches Contribute Largely to Relief of Ministers.

PITTSBURG—The last obstacle in the way of the "Billy" Sunday evangelistic meetings was removed Nov. 19 when the nine councilmen of Pittsburg passed a special ordinance permitting the erection of the tabernacle within the city fire limits. The Allegheny County Liquor Dealers' Association opposed the granting of the ordinance and notwithstanding the fact that this association brought all its influence to bear on the council, it passed by a vote of eight to one. More than 800 personal workers attended the first meeting in Second church Nov. 18. A. J. Gill, Mr. Sunday's advance man, declares that he has never seen greater interest in the preliminary work in any other city. Already more singers than will be needed have offered their services and one male and three mixed choruses will be organized.

Work for $250,000 Fund—The five men representing the Board of Ministerial Relief are still in the city and are hopeful of receiving Pittsburg's allotted $250,000 of the $10,000,000 endowment fund. The following churches have contributed: Third church, $17,000; Shady Side, $20,000; First, $8,000; Highland, $18,000; Wilkinsburg First, $3,000; Aspinwall, $650; Greenfield, $500; Monongahela, $7,000; Washington, $500; North, $1,500; Doraopolis, $5,550; Shady Avenue, $550; Sheridan, $700; Mount Lebanon, $300, and Oakdale, $800. The campaign will be continued for some weeks.

Y. M. C. A. After Money—The Y. M. C. A. began its annual campaign to raise sufficient funds to meet all running expenses Nov. 24. Nine teams of ten men each will make the canvass and aside from the tuition and membership fees, which will amount to $90,000, the public will be asked to contribute $70,000. This will be distributed to the different branches according to the need.

Women Observe Mission Week—The Women's Interdenominational Missionary Union of Allegheny county observed home mission week Nov. 20-22. Aside from the meetings in Second church eight district meetings were held. The campaign closed in Second church Saturday afternoon.

Will Continue Seminary Campaign—At a meeting of the trustees of Western Theological Seminary Nov. 18 it was decided to continue the building fund campaign until it reaches $200,000. Already over $135,000 has been subscribed.

Will Help Homeless Men—Pittsburg is to have an industrial home for men down and out. Plans were announced by John H. Flaherty, superintendent of the Association for the Improvement of the Poor. The new home will accommodate 400 men. Every effort will be made to secure employment and to help those who are housed to self-support. It is proposed to provide the money for this work by making use of waste of the city such as paper and rags.

Gospel Cornet Stops Merry-go-Round

During the summer evangelistic campaign among the religiously neglected miners of southern Colorado the cornet of the gospel team and the music of a merry-go-round clashed. Joseph Leksa of Dubuque German College and Seminary always called attention to the gospel meetings through his cornet. At one camp the merry-go-round and the evangelists, sent out by the Home Board, began operations the same evening on opposite sides of a street.

The next day the civic authorities, on their own initiative, suggested to the owner of the traveling amusement device that the machine be kept quiet during the religious services. With this request there was ready compliance.

This is one incident of many in a two months' tour among foreigners of many nationalities. Mr. Leksa was only one of a number of students of our institution who were engaged in preaching to their countrymen during the summer.

We will be glad to tell you more of this summer service by our students, as well as the regular activities of our graduates. Let us know that you are interested — we ask nothing more. Address Dubuque German College and Seminary, C. M. STEFFENS, D. D., President, Dubuque, Iowa

Recent Meeting on Christian Education Addressed by Prominent Speakers — Temperance Folks of Capital Watch New Law.

WASHINGTON, D. C.—The New York Avenue church was crowded recently when three eminent Presbyterians spoke in the interest of Christian education. Secretary Worden of Sunday school fame, Secretary Cochran of the Board of Education and Secretary Bryan of the state department were the strong trio. It was a notable moment when Mr. Bryan, with even more than his usual vigor, asserted his conviction that "there is no education in any complete or adequate sense which has failed to include the Bible in its curriculum."

To Talk on Health Problems—Dr. Charles E. Barker, who was physical adviser to the president during Mr. Taft's administration, is just commencing an engagement with the international committee of the Y. M. C. A. He will visit about thirty cities during the year, speaking to men of all classes concerning the most practical problems of physical health.

Women May Drink—In the District of Columbia there is danger that all restrictions in regard to women in saloons may be lost under the provisions of the new excise law enacted by congress. The law allows women to drink in "restaurants" at any time, this provision being crowded in by the liquor men. It takes no prophetic talent to prognosticate the condition that may soon result in the capital city and the temperance people are properly concerned.

Bryan at Mission Celebration—The most significant feature of the thirtieth anniversary exercises of Central Union mission was an address by Secretary Bryan. Everyone in the immense audience that heard him was deeply impressed by the astounding frankness of his assertion that Christianity is the only power for the uplifting of individuals as well as nations, and of nations as well as individuals.

Reach All Churches for China—The China campaign was participated in by Washington churches Nov. 14-17. Practically all the churches in the city and suburbs were reached. The "team" was composed of eight of the most effective missionary speakers that could have been brought together for the purpose—Dr. J. C. Garritt, leader of the team, with Dr. A. A. Fulton, Rev. W. H. Luce, Rev. W. H. Lingle, Dr. C. A. Killie, Rev. W. T. Locke, Rev. David S. Tappan, Jr., and Rev. W. H. Gleysteen. Two members of the team stood in a particularly personal relation to the presbytery, Dr. Killie having gone to China from Fourth church, of which Dr. J. T. Kelley is pastor, and Dr. Garritt being the missonary pastor of Metropolitan church, of which Rev. Paul R. Hickok is pastor.

Entertains Speakers—General John W. Foster, formerly American minister to China, an active elder in the Church of the Covenant, Dr. Charles Wood pastor, opened his spacious home for a reception to the China "team" and about 200 men of the city churches.

HELP FOR THOROUGH SOCIAL SURVEY

Topeka Wants to Know Facts About Itself—Invite Everyone to Church—District Plan for Membership Oversight.

TOPEKA—The social survey of Topeka undertaken by the Federation of Churches is now in progress under experts sent by the Russell Sage Foundation. In addition to aid tendered by the commercial club and women's clubs, other unexpected assistance has been extended. The school board has offered to pay the expenses of a survey of the entire public school system of the city if this work is added to the original program, and the state university at Lawrence has offered to assist by making chemical tests for sewage contamination of the 2,000 wells in Topeka.

Make Church-Going Popular—Topeka had an "everybody at church day" Nov. 23. Thirty thousand personal invitations, signed by individual Christians, were delivered in the city.

Elders Look After People—A plan has been worked out by the pastor of First church by which its membership of 1,300 persons has been divided into district groups, each in charge of an elder and his wife, for social and religious oversight—A special series of Sunday evening sermons is being given at First church, based on Bible story and illustrated by current books and everyday life. Some of the books discussed are "The Inside of the Cup," Sir Oliver Lodge's "Annual Address," "Crowds," Eucken's "Life's Basis and Life's Ideal." Two of the books are by Topeka authors, "Jesus Is Here," by Charles M. Sheldon, and "A Master's Degree," by Margaret Hill McCarter.

Pictures for Children—Westminster church is making a great success of a monthly Sunday evening service for children. The pastor, Rev. Ralph Ward, preaches a sermon illustrated by stereopticon pictures and the children furnish the singing.

New Books of Spiritual Interest

The Way Home By the author of "The Inner Shrine." BASIL KING

"One sees and feels the materialism of our day, nowhere so great maybe, as in New York. The book is a brilliant and moving demonstration of the thesis, 'Man cannot live by bread alone.' The situations are clear, and skillfully handled, the characters real people. The book interests—holds, moves one. It is a book you want to lend to a friend, and then when he has read it, sit and talk it over with him. I will preach on it some evening."—N. McGee Waters, Pastor, The Tompkins Ave. Congregational Church, Brooklyn. Illustrated. $1.35 net.

Thirty Pieces of Silver

By CLARENCE B. KELLAND

Dramatic as a play, with the spiritual appeal of a poetic allegory, is this telling of the vision that came to a brilliant atheistic orator. The coin that slipped from the greedy palm of Judas down through the ages into the modern lecturer's hand convicted him as an accomplice of the Great Betrayer. Illustrated. Cloth, 50 cents net; leather, in four different shades, $1.00 net.

Finding His Soul

By NORMAN DUNCAN

A big-hearted, merry man, is one of the best traveling salesmen in his line. His little boy dies, and the cruel blow unhinges his reason. The firm sends him abroad in the hope of rescuing him from his bitter unreason. He visits the Holy Land. The reality of the land which gave religion to the Western World arouses him. On Christmas Eve, among the hills of Bethlehem, he has a wonderful experience: finds his soul. Illustrated. 16*mo, cloth,* 50 cents net; leather, in four different shades, $1.00 net.

Prayer—What It Is and What It Does

By DR. SAMUEL McCOMB

The writer, who is associate director of the Emmanuel Church Movement in Boston, points out in this book the new interest in prayer which is apparent everywhere. Scientifically minded men no longer scoff at this wonderful force, he shows, but are endeavoring to understand something of its nature and its results. The aim of prayer, the effect of prayer, the practicability of prayer are all emphasized, and the author concludes with valuable hints as to how the habit of prayer may be acquired. 16*mo, cloth,* 50 cents net; leather, $1.00 net.

TOKYO MAYOR VISITS SUNDAY SCHOOLS

Japanese Official Favors Christianity—Miss Hills Leaves Money to Boards—Moving Pictures to Report Work of Charity.

NEW YORK—The mayor of Tokyo, D. Tagawa, who is on a tour of investigation in the United States, is visiting some of the larger Sunday schools in Greater New York in order to report upon them when he returns to Japan, where the 1916 world's Sunday school convention is to be held in his own city. In his address to the Bushwick Avenue Central M. E. church Nov. 16 Mayor Tagawa said: "Japan has learned many things from you. Pray that she may accept Christianity also."

Union to Hold Dinner—The annual dinner of the Presbyterian Union will be held Dec. 1 at the Hotel Savoy. The reception will begin at 6:30 and dinner will be served at 7 o'clock. Addresses will be made by Dr. E. Van Dyke Wight, moderator of New York Synod, and Rev. Nehemiah Boynton, ex-moderator of the Congregational Council and pastor of Clinton Avenue Congregational church, Brooklyn.

Leaves Money to Church Boards—Miss Sarah B. Hills, who died Nov. 9, left practically all of her estate, estimated at $150,000, to religious and charitable organizations. The Boards of Home and Foreign Missions, the American Tract Society, the Children's Aid Society and Hampton Institute are among the beneficiaries to receive $1,000 each, while the bulk of the property goes to the Board of Church Erection and the American Sunday School Union. Miss Hills was the sister of the late James R. Hills of New York.

Christmas Star in Madison Square—A large Christmas star on a thirty-foot shaft has been put up in Madison Square. The donors are known only to the city officials whose permission was necessary. The star is to be lighted every night with electricity, and unlike the gigantic Christmas tree placed in the square for the first time last year, will remain throughout the year and for many years, it is expected. There will be another Christmas tree this year, with elaborate choral and instrumental music on Christmas eve. The star is to be called "The Star of Hope."

Central Church Publishes Paper—Dr. John F. Carson and his people in Central church, Brooklyn, have just issued the first number of "The Central Gazette." The communicant membership of Central church is 2,307 and counting adherents and Sunday school its parish numbers about 3,700 persons. Some medium other than the weekly calendar has long been felt necessary.

Pictures Show Charity Methods—The New York Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor at its seventieth anniversary celebration last week illustrated by moving pictures the advance that has been made in caring for and assisting the poor. Every department of the society's work was shown, from the old and new ways of keeping the baby clean to disposing of ashes and garbage.

Women Raise Money—Nov. 17 was Woman's Day in the Y. M.-Y. W. C. A. campaign for $4,000,000. The association's graduate nurses in particular gave themselves to the work and many gifts were received in memory of Mrs. Janet McCook Whitman, who did so much for the honor and advancement of her profession. Miss Anna Maxwell, superintendent of the Presbyterian hospital's training school for nurses, headed a team composed entirely of professional nurses.

Merchants Invite Association—The Merchants' Association of the city has invited the Religious Education Association to hold its annual convention in New York in 1915.

Personal Notes—Dr. Jonathan C. Day of Labor Temple was one of the speakers at the dinner given for the men of Newark Presbytery during home mission week.—In the recent death of W. T. Whitman Lafayette Avenue church, Brooklyn, lost a deacon who had held office for over thirty years. Mr. Whitman was also a teacher in the Sunday school.—Rev. William B. Gates, pastor of Wells Memorial church, Brooklyn, and Dr. T. H. P. Sailer, honorary secretary of the Presbyterian Board's department of missionary education, were among the speakers at the recent Kings county C. E. convention in Brooklyn.—Rev. G. H. Eggleston, pastor of Greene Avenue church, presided over the quiet hour conference at the annual convention of the Brooklyn C. E. Union last week.—Lyman Beecher Stowe, who is connected with the George Junior Republic at Freeville, N. Y., was a recent speaker at the Wednesday civic forum at Labor Temple.—At the recent Kings county Sunday school convention the retiring president, Edward R. Carhart, was presented with a handsome silver vase. Mr. Carhart has been president of the Brooklyn union the past five years.

Brief Items—Brooklyn C. E. Union has organized a "workers' library" with a librarian in charge.—Classon Avenue church in Brooklyn, Dr. J. D. Burrell pastor, numbers a "Child Study Club" among its various activities.—Christ church, affiliated with Brick church, recently celebrated its twenty-fifth anniversary. Rev. G. S. Webster, pastor of the Church of the Covenant, which bears a similar relation to Brick church, spoke at Christ church in the evening.—At the brotherhood dinner Nov. 17 in North church, Dr. John R. Mackay pastor, the speaker was Edward D. Very, sanitary engineer of the street cleaning department.

Harlem Pastor to Glens Falls—Dr. J. Lyon Caughey, for eight years pastor of Harlem church, has received a call to Glens Falls church, from which Dr. D. H. Martin resigned recently in order to take up the work of the new Washington Heights church. Previous to Dr. Martin's ministry Dr. John R. Mackay of North church was pastor at Glens Falls. Dr. Caughey came to Harlem from a pastorate in Rochester when the Harlem church was located in 125th street. Soon after his arrival in New York the Harlem people erected a building at Mount Morris park. It is understood that he will accept.

WILL EXTEND ITS HOME MISSION WORK

Los Angeles Will Try to Raise Money to Help Weak Churches—Dr. Shaw's Installation Followed by Rallies.

LOS ANGELES—The board of church extension of presbytery has inaugurated a campaign for an increase in contributions for home missions and church erection within presbytery. In addition to the regular offerings of $12,000 the board wishes to raise $10,000 for the purchase of lots at strategic points and to assist churches that are trying to provide themselves with suitable houses of worship. All offerings for church erection are to be turned into the local treasury. Ten per cent of it will be forwarded to the board in New York. Rev. L. C. Kirkes has been made superintendent of church extension work.

Rallies at Immanuel Church—Immanuel church celebrated the occasion of the installation of its new pastor, Dr. John B. Shaw, by conducting rally services in all departments. The evening following the installation a reception was given to Dr. and Mrs. Shaw by the church. Dr. Shaw is giving a series of Friday evening lectures to young people of his congregation.

Westlake Has Anniversary—The twelfth anniversary of the pastorate of Rev. W. D. Landis over Westlake church was celebrated recently. Elders E. L. Dodd, J. E. Minton and Judge Crowe assisted the pastor at the evening service and a special song service was conducted in the evening. A reception was given in honor of the pastor and his wife the following Friday. Twelve years ago Westlake church, then in Cumberland Assembly, had a membership of fifty-seven and owned property valued at $3,000. The present membership of the church is 278, with property worth $45,000.

Form Independent Church—An independent Presbyterian church has been organized at Long Beach, composed of the supporters of Dr. Mason in the controversy in First church which resulted in his retirement from the pastorate of that congregation. Second church, Long Beach, was organized just prior to the controversy which resulted in the division of First church.

May Increase License Fee—An attempt to extend the "wet" zone in the city seems to have resulted in further restrictions rather than increased liberties. A majority of the members of the city council voted recently to keep the sale of liquor within the present bounds. A proposition to increase the license fee for the sale of liquor is receiving serious consideration.

Leavenworth Deeply Stirred

A union evangelistic campaign in Leavenworth, Kan., under Dr. French E. Oliver has had unusual results. It is said that 816 have joined the churches, a movement has been started for a Y. W. C. A., unlicensed drinking places have been closed through the activity of the attorney general, whose attention was attracted by the sermons of the evangelist. The Presbyterian church, Rev. R. B. A. McBride pastor, received many members.

Old Bell Was Cast by Paul Revere

A bell cast shortly before the war of 1812 by Paul Revere, the noted Revolutionary night rider, and which had been in the tower of the First Congregational church at Dover, N. H., was recently brought to the plant of the Meneely Bell Company, on River street, Troy, N. Y., to be disposed of as old metal. The bell weighs 1,000 pounds and is cracked. The concern recently placed a new bell in the tower and had to take the old bell as part payment. The Meneely Company makes such a high standard of bells that it could not use the metal in new bells. Paul Revere was a noted bell caster and many of his bells are today scattered through New England. During the last ten years the Meneely Company has gathered about six or seven of them. Chester Meneely has recently installed a chime of twelve bells in the new municipal buildings of Springfield, Mass. The chimes are to be rung on patriotic occasions.

ASK FOR HARD HOME MISSION FIELDS

McCormick Seminary Students Show Spirit—Home Mission Week Results—Volunteer Workers Can Find Jobs with Missions.

CHICAGO—Home Mission Week in this city practically closed last Monday night, when the regular Monday evening meeting of the students of McCormick Seminary was given over to the consideration of home missions under the leadership of Dr. E. P. Hill. During the last few weeks thirty-five men of the seminary have in response to a suggestion by Mr. Felton of the Home Board promised to consider a home mission field as the center of their activity after graduation. Professors at the seminary look upon this fact as one of the indications of a deep interest in evangelism on the part of the church as a whole. The students are also asking where the most difficult fields are located and are seeking to fit themselves for the hardest places. Another indication of the results of presentation of home mission work is indicated in the suburb of Highland Park, where the congregation may ask that a certain portion of the home mission territory of Chicago be set apart as their particular field.

Clearing House for Workers—Plans are being perfected under the leadership of Rev. W. E. Parker, Jr., associate secretary of the Church Extension Board, to bring opportunities for service to the notice of volunteer workers among the churches. Mr. Parker operated this plan among the Christian Endeavorers of San Francisco with good results. If a man or woman is willing to give an hour a week for work for which he or she is particularly fitted, Mr. Parker will be able to tell just what are the opportunities to do the most good. This clearing house will cover all manner of activities among the churches and settlements; teachers, lay preachers, singers and lecturers. Cooperating with this effort, Dr. Francis M. Fox of the brotherhood has already obtained information from fifty-six churches of the city concerning the kind of help by men needed in them. The men are wanted as workers with boys, singers, choir leaders, Sunday school superintendents, manual training teachers, soloists and teachers of English.

Rejoicing at Maywood Church—The successful ending of the two years' campaign to eliminate the debt on the building was celebrated in connection with the burning of the mortgage at Maywood church last Sunday afternoon. Neighboring pastors of other denominations assisted the minister, Dr. Edward Beckwith, in the services. Dr. E. P. Hill gave an address. C. S. Hulburd, one of the three surviving charter members, read a historical sketch. This church, which was organized in 1872, has paid out $60,000 in principal and interest for buildings, two structures having been burned, the second before a mortgage of several thousand dollars was paid. The present building was dedicated Oct. 7, 1906. A committee of men of the church obtained from sources outside the village $1,400; the Church Extension Board gave $1,800, individuals in the congregation $1,065 and church societies $500. The church now has every bill paid, according to W. C. Keefer, treasurer.

Three Moderators to Be Present—The second dinner of the Social Union Dec. 5 at Hotel LaSalle will have as guests of honor and speakers moderators of the Northern, Southern and U. P. Churches—Dr. John Timothy Stone, Dr. J. S. Lyon of Louisville, Ky., and Dr. R. M. Russell of New Wilmington, Pa. The fourth and last dinner of the union this year will be held in the banquet hall of the new Fourth church.

To Report on Home for Aged—The committee appointed by presbytery to take steps to provide a home for the aged is making progress. Dr. David H. Jones, chairman, has appointed as committee to examine the various properties offered Rev. N. B. Barr, Charles M. Moderwell and James W. Hedenberg. This committee has given much time to its duties and new offers are received from day to day. No decision will be reached until all places have been thoroughly considered. The committee is expected to report Monday, Dec. 1.

Found Missions Great Force in China—Hon. W. J. Calhoun, former ambassador to China, addressed the Y. M. C. A. Twenty-Four-Hour-a-Day Club at the University Club Nov. 18. Mr. Calhoun said he went to China with a tendency in his mind to doubt the usefulness of missionary work in view of the need at home, but returned fully convinced that missions were the greatest force for good now operating in that land. Secretary Lerrigo of the Y. M. C. A. work in China also spoke. He returns to the field in December.

Brief Items—There was a larger attendance than usual at the ninth annual concert, Orchestra Hall, Nov. 20, of the Men's Choral Union of the Cook County Sunday School Association. The chorus grows in number and power under the direction of Edward T. Clissold. — Secretary Hubert C. Herring of the National Council of the Congregationalists—the so-called new "bishop"—will speak at the annual rally of the City Missionary Society of that denomination at the Auditorium Dec. 9.

Plan Parade of 50,000 Men—A parade of men which it is hoped will number 50,000 is planned as part of the Sunday school convention in this city next June. Delegates are being asked from all Sunday schools, the request being accompanied by the suggestion that workers rather than sightseers are desired.

Stirs the Community—The formal campaign for Buena Memorial church fund for $125,000 closed last Monday. By Sunday $40,000 had been obtained. There were then 800 pledges and 90 per cent of the church membership had given. A plan by which members each pledged a week's income brought in a large amount of money Sunday. Many residents of the community have been brought into relation with the church through the campaign.

Try to Close Saloons New Year's Eve—The Federation of Churches Monday morning decided to send a resolution to the mayor and make other efforts to close the saloons of the city on New Year's eve. Tentative arrangements have also been made to hold evangelistic services at six points on downtown streets to attract the crowd that evening. It is possible that similar services will be held in theaters.

Plan Big Fight on Saloons—Delegates from Catholic and Protestant church organizations, from social settlements and from women's clubs, meeting at the City Club Monday noon under the auspices of the Anti-Saloon League, decided to urge their organizations to unite at once in an educational campaign to culminate in an effort to bring the question of saloons in Chicago to a vote in a year or two. Scientific educational methods will be used to show the evil effects of the liquor traffic to manufacturers and to the newly enfranchised women, especially those of foreign birth.

DAN CRAWFORD AT MISSION BANQUET

Detroit Men Will Gather—Elder Urges Advertising for Churches—Two Congregations Ask for Organization.

DETROIT—The united missionary campaign in Detroit and Michigan is to culminate in a banquet at the Light Guard Armory Dec. 5, when it is expected that 900 men will be present. This is to further the every-members canvass for home and foreign missions, for which Presbyterians have been planning a vigorous campaign a little later on. Dan Crawford is to be the speaker.

Ministers and Officials Lunch—As a happy sequel to the appointment of the committee of the Presbyterian Ministers' Association to arrange for a closer touch between the officers of the various Presbyterian churches in Detroit the Jefferson Avenue church invited all the ministers and officers to the number of over 500 to a buffet lunch and conference Nov. 25.

Urges Advertising—J. W. Watson, an elder in Fort Street church and an expert in advertising, was invited to address the ministers last Monday on the subject of efficient church advertising. His idea was for all the Presbyterian churches to combine in a systematic and sustained scheme of letting the public know what Presbyterian churches have to offer. The whole matter has been referred to a competent committee.

Brief Bits of News—The federation of churches in Detroit is trying to effect something practical under its new organization in spite of the apathy and inactivity of the state organization. New officers have been chosen and it is hoped that they will do something more than mark time in the future. — The central district conference of the American Sunday School Union, comprising the states of Michigan, Ohio, Indiana, western Pennsylvania and western New York, was held in Detroit Y. M. C. A. for a week ending Nov. 17. Detroit Presbyterians are large contributors to this society.—Dr. Robert J. Young of the Church of the Covenant has had to take a vacation on account of a nervous breakdown.

Two Churches Forming—Petitions were presented to presbytery Nov. 17 for the organization of two new churches—one at Fairview, a factory district of the city, and the other from a new residence district on West Grand boulevard. They were both referred to the church extension committee and the executive commission with power to act.

fication is one that will be indorsed by sensible men whether they have the alphabetical distinction or not. Albert Barnes would not permit this title to be printed after his name in his commentaries or elsewhere, and he was regarded as a pretty fair theologian even in those days of heresy trials. Who ever heard of Henry Ward Beecher, D. D., of Charles H. Spurgeon, D. D.? These men did not need any titles to call attention to their qualifications or position.

As Presbyterians we believe in the "parity of the ministry." Why, then, should any title distinguishing one minister from another be paraded in our official publication, the Minutes of the General Assembly? Let us have less "doctoring" of the minutes. If the next Assembly wants to hit something hard, let it take a whack at ministerial titles. It is likely the lay commissioners would have to strike the blow, but let them. B.

Buffalo Presbytery Directs Affairs on Business Basis—Conferences on Methods Attract Large Interest—Study Finance.

BUFFALO—Buffalo Presbyterianism is proud of the way in which the polity of the church is conforming itself to the most modern and highly efficient business methods. The presbyterial executive commission has become a highly organized board of directors. Its members are selected by presbytery from its most representative and forceful men. Its monthly meetings begin on the minute with every chair, as a rule, occupied, although its members are men at the head of great enterprises.

Suggest Proper Work of Session—Presbytery has just sent a letter to all its churches "On the Place and Power of the Church Session in the Local Church." Sessions are urged to take a large supervisory responsibility toward all departments and activities of their respective churches, and the churches are called upon to elect to the eldership persons who are not only of high character and faith but also men of affairs possessing executive ability and the spirit of service.

Hold Presbyterial Conferences — Another expression of the consecrated business sense of Buffalo Presbytery is the way in which presbytery has coordinated all its permanent presbyterial committees into five departments which cover respectively missions and church finance, religious education, church extension and social service, men's and women's clubs. These large departments are dealing directly with individual churches, but thus far have rendered largest service in conducting presbyterial conferences. The most recent of these has just been held in First church under direction of the department of missions and church finance, of which A. V. V. Raymond, D. D., is chairman. Discussions on church budgets and every-member canvasses were led by two experts on church finance. The conference attracted large numbers of laymen and was preceded by a dinner given by the Presbyterian Ministers' Fellowship club to all the delegates attending the conference.

PRESBYTERY HELPS WEAK CHURCHES

CINCINNATI—The church extension committee of presbytery has obtained $1,800 toward canceling the debt on Wilson Memorial church, the only English Protestant congregation in St. Bernard. Blue Ash and Madeira churches have also been assisted by the same committee under the chairmanship of Dr. F. N. McMillin.

Solves Evening Problem—Wyoming's experiment with a vesper service to replace the Sabbath evening sermon has proved successful. Large congregations attend and Rev. A. Lee Wilson thinks the problem of evening attendance has been successfully solved.

Churches Grow—The Italian church in the old Central has a new pastor, Rev. Pasquale De Carlo, who was one of the speakers at the four nights of special missionary services given by the more than sixty members of the mission study classes in that church.—Clifford church, which was a mission of Mount Auburn, has grown so strong that it has been incorporated. Rev. Frank Marston is pastor. Ren Mulford, Jr.

MANY WOMEN AT MEETING

KANSAS CITY—The Woman's Missionary Union held its semiannual meeting in Central church Nov. 13 with 500 women in attendance. A very helpful program was given morning and afternoon. Miss Kate Moss, a returned missionary from Bulgaria, deserves special mention.

Want Local Headquarters—A movement is on foot to establish a local Presbyterian headquarters. It is felt that there is a great need for a central rallying place for workers. It would always be a place where visiting Presbyterians in the city might be welcomed.

To Leave Downtown—The "Old Second," mother of churches in this city, lived and wrought wondrously for forty-seven years in its old location down town. It sent forth a continuous stream of members into the churches established in the newer parts of the city. Finally the church was forced to move into one of the new and rapidly growing sections of the city, where it has purchased a lot and in the not very distant future expects to erect a building in keeping with the character and history of this church.

Helps Many Girls—"The Westminster," the hotel conducted by First church for girls away from home, is proving a far greater success than was anticipated by its promoters. The home accommodates forty girls and its capacity is exhausted. Charles C. McGinley.

FIVE SUGGESTIVE ITEMS

Three Denominations Mingle — The federated church at Marion, Kan., consisting of the Presbyterian and Baptist churches, is served by a Congregational minister, Rev. G. T. Nichols.

Pastors Talk in Schools—Pastors of Gary, Ind., have been invited to give regular talks in the public schools on morality. The program has been arranged by the city superintendent of schools. It is expected that pupils will also have an opportunity to go to their churches each week for religious education.

Tackle Community Problems—Special meetings were held each evening of Home Mission Week in Washington, Kan., church under the direction of the pastor, Rev. F. M. Zugg. The Wednesday evening meeting was conducted by the men's organization and community problems were considered. The week closed with special Thanksgiving programs in the various departments.

Gains Every Year—Despite the poor crops of Kansas the church at Halstead, Dr. J. M. Oliver pastor, during September and October doubled its offerings over last year. In the last seven years the church has gained 850 per cent in benevolences and leads all churches of the state by a large margin in per capita gifts to the boards—last year $7.50. Each of the past seven years has seen a better report than the preceding.

Keep On Going to Church—On the second Sunday after the special effort was made at Joliet, Ill., to get everybody to church, the congregation of Central church was one-third larger than before the campaign. The plan has resulted in the formation of the "Go to Church Circle," which is composed of two members from each church. It is intended that the campaign shall be repeated at intervals and church attendance increased.

SCHOOL AND COLLEGE

Dr. Stone Visits Park College—Moderator John Timothy Stone spent Nov. 11 as the guest of Park College. At the chapel hour Dr. Stone gave an address. At 12:30 he was entertained at luncheon in the alumni building by the faculty and their wives. The glee club and members of the faculty accompanied Dr. Stone back to Kansas City to attend the dinner of the Presbyterian League.

New "Prexy" Installed—Dr. Alexander Thomas Ormond was formally inaugurated president of Grove City College, Grove City, Pa., Nov. 16. Dr. Ormond was professor of philosophy in Princeton University and is the author of several works on philosophy. At the inauguration exercises a letter of personal appreciation from President Woodrow Wilson was read.

WILL SUPERVISE BENEVOLENCES PLAN

Working through the presbyterial committees and missionary committees of churches of Illinois, Dr. W. S. Marquis hopes to increase the efficiency of every Presbyterian in the state. He has recently assumed the duties of superintendent of benevolences for the synod, an office which corresponds to nothing arranged by other synods, although Ohio is thinking of adopting similar oversight for the benevolences of that state. Dr. Marquis is participating in the laymen's missionary conferences in Illinois, speaking at Princeton, Kewanee and Monmouth this week and next. Dr. Marquis will have an office at Presbyterian headquarters, Chicago. He has been made pastor emeritus of Broadway church, Rock Island, which he has served thirty years.

TWO CHURCHES JOIN FORCES

KANSAS—The Methodists, who are preparing to rebuild, have accepted an invitation to worship with the Presbyterians of Florence while without a church home. In a few weeks the two churches will join forces in their Sabbath school and church services until the new building is completed.

Older People in Sunday School—Recently a men's Bible class and a woman's Bible class were organized at Cedar Point. The school heretofore has been composed chiefly of the younger people.

Will Sell The Continent—The young people of Kipp held a Christian Endeavor rally during the afternoon of Nov. 17, ate supper together and held an evening conference under the leadership of the field secretary. The women of the church will have their annual bazar Dec. 11. One of the features will be a "papers booth." An effort will be made to secure a good-sized club for The Continent and Assembly Herald.

Mission Conferences—A three days' campaign for missions was recently held at Parsons and Chanute under the direction of Dr. C. E. Bradt.

CHURCH IS CLEARED OF $12,000 DEBT

Two Newark Congregations Rejoice—Orange Men Cook Own Dinner—Place Tablets for Faithful Officers.

NEW JERSEY—Sunday night, Nov. 23, Central church of Newark, assisted by Third church, held a jubliee service to celebrate the burning of the $12,000 mortgage on the Central church's property. The Central congregation—of which Dr. George Walton King is pastor—had paid up two-thirds of its debt when Third church, which some time ago started a campaign to help other local Presbyterian churches, offered to pay the remaining $4,000. Among those who took part at the jubilee services were Dr. R. S. Inglis, pastor of Third church, Dr. E. S. Young of Brooklyn, a former pastor of Central, and Dr. D. R. Frazer, pastor emeritus of First church.

Women Study Missions—A series of lectures is being given in Central church of Orange under the auspices of the International Federation of the Oranges for Mission Study. Mrs. D. Edwin Waid, acting president of the Women's Board of Home Missions, was the speaker Nov. 17.

Pastor Ten Years—A reception was given by the Crescent Avenue church, Plainfield, Nov. 13 to Dr. and Mrs. John Sheridan Zelie on the occasion of the tenth anniversary of Dr. Zelie's pastorate. He succeeded William R. Richards, D. D. Crescent Avenue church has 1,130 members and maintains three chapels which report 678 members.

Tablet for Pastor—On Nov. 17 a tablet to the memory of Rev. Jedediah Chapman was put up on the outside wall of First church of Orange, Dr. Charles Townsend pastor. Mr. Chapman, who was a chaplain in Washington's army during the revolution, was pastor of First church from 1766 to 1800.—Elmwood church, East Orange, Rev. Charles E. Bullard pastor, will hold a memorial service Sunday afternoon, Nov. 30, for the late Frederick M. Shepard, who was superintendent of the Sunday school for many years. A bronze tablet to his memory will be unveiled.

Pastoral Changes—The church at Lambertville will lose its pastor, Rev. Roy E. Vale. He goes to the First Reformed (Dutch) church. A previous call from this church he declined.—East Trenton church has called Clarence E. Hills, D. D., of the Presbytery of Huntingdon. The church has been vacant since April.

NEWS FROM VARIOUS STATES

Ohio—Dr. Maitland Alexander of Pittsburg was the speaker at the banquet to the officers of the Presbyterian churches of Cleveland Nov. 20. This meeting had been postponed from the previous week on account of the severe snowstorm which tied up all traffic. Dr. Merle-Smith of New York came for that meeting, but had to go back home again, as the meeting had been called off.

Washington—Synod recently appointed Rev. S. A. Siewert as university pastor to cooperate with Rev. Norman B. Harrison, pastor of University church, Seattle. The church is a block from the university campus and reaches a large number of students. The morning congregation is as large as the total membership, which has grown from 160 to 380 in two years. New features adopted by the church this fall include: Weekly church bulletin, Sabbath school orchestra, specialist in boys' work, first aid and nursing course for girls, duplex envelope system, missionary library, brotherhood and a C. E. society for high school pupils. The church has two candidates for the ministry and six student volunteers. In recent months two young people have gone from the church as workers in China.

Indiana—South Bend Westminster church recently celebrated the tenth anniversary of Rev. Henry B. Hostetter's pastorate. During the decade 675 members have been received, the membership growing from 150 to 605. The Sunday school enrolls 625 and is the largest in South Bend.

Michigan—The largest collection ever taken in the Sunday school of Cadillac church, $265.60, was racently raised in response to a missionary appeal. Rev. Alfred D. Atwood, synodical Sunday school superintendent, made an address.—Caro church will be assisted in the celebration of the tenth anniversary of its building Nov. 30 by Rev. R. G. Kearns of Chicago, a former pastor.

ADVANCE OF THE TEMPERANCE FORCES

More "Dry" Towns in Oregon—About thirty local option elections were held recently in Oregon. Fifteen of the towns are definitely announced as "dry." This gives the temperance people the victory in Salem, the capital; in Springfield, which destroys the menace to the state university and the chief distributing center in the middle of the state, and adds several other important cities to the "dry" column. But one town that was already "dry" was lost, and that was a small one.

College Students Study Prohibition—Cornell, California, Minnesota, Northwestern, Ohio State, Ohio, Syracuse, Columbia, Ohio Wesleyan, DePauw, Kentucky, Florida, Georgia, Baylor, Missouri, Nebraska, Nebraska Wesleyan, Stanford, Washington, Wisconsin, Iowa and Oklahoma universities, and Kansas State, Iowa State, Swarthmore and Oregon Agricultural colleges all have active prohibition clubs to study the liquor problem.—Active leagues in 206 colleges and universities in twenty-four states is the latest report of the Intercollegiate Prohibition Association, the organization of the college prohibition movement.

DR. JOHNSON AND THE COLLEGE BOARD

The last letter received by the College Board from Dr. Herrick Johnson, its president emeritus, showed that his interest in that department of the church's work held to the end:

"Germantown, Nov. 4th, 1913.

"Dear Old Friends of the College Board: I would gladly drop in on the board at its next meeting, Nov. 11. But it hardly seems wise in my present state of health. I want to assure you all, however, of my unlessened interest in everything pertaining to the board and its work. I have been especially interested in 'Extension Planning and Prosecution.' Cordially yours,

"Herrick Johnson."

MINISTERIAL OBITUARY

Dr. James Ross, pastor of St. Andrew's Presbyterian church, London, Ontario, was run down Nov. 19 by an automobile in New York City and injured so badly that he died soon afterward. Dr. Ross was born in Aberdeenshire, Scotland, and was 62 years of age. He was graduated from Queen's University at Kingston and from 1892 to 1904 was professor of practical theology in Montreal Presbyterian College. Since 1904 he had been pastor of St. Andrew's church. He was a director of the Canadian Bible Society, and in 1905 was elected president of the Ontario Bible Society. He was the author of several books on theology.

Real Aid to Soldiers—Two camps of 4,000 soldiers each, drawn together for maneuvers in the Philippine islands, were favored with association conveniences by Army Secretary Collins. In four days over 4,500 envelopes were used by the soldiers in writing from the camp.

OBITUARY

Death notices will be inserted at the rate of one notice. Those who ask their pastor to write such notices should be careful to hand him the money to forward with the copy.

Hills—There may be a few who remember James R. Hills, who after a life of earnest service of his Lord entered into rest leaving a sister, like-minded with him, who had made her home with him, who after his death gave herself anew to every good work and loving service. There are many whose hearts are sad today because that sister, Sarah B. Hills, is no more with us.

Much of her service was of a purely personal character but much of it was through such societies as the Ladies' Christian Union, the Y. W. C. A. and the Bible and Fruit mission to public hospitals and also by generous and intelligent gifts in support of the work of her church through its several boards in New York City, where she made her home.

At the service held Nov. 11 in the lecture room of Madison Square church, Dr. Parkhurst, her pastor, made a brief address; from this the following extracts are made:

"Her life through all these years has been a life of discipleship and apostleship. She fed her soul from divine truths. She walked quietly with her divine Lord; but while she maintained that steady life of discipleship she maintained also as steady a life of apostleship. When we have examples before us of lives that are so spiritual, so Christlike, so absolutely transparent in their testimony to the upholding and sustaining and forgiving power that God has revealed in the life and death and resurrection of Jesus Christ, it is fair to her, it is due to us, that we should let these be known."

"According to My Gospel"

The author devotes himself very largely to spiritual and devotional themes rather than controversial or doctrinal subjects, so that the material presented in this book is, to use his own expression, for common Christian purposes.'" Net $1.25

JOHN A. HUTTON, M. A.

At Close Quarters

"Direct, heart-to-heart, personal messages. The same clear reasoning which characterized the author's earlier work is found in this volume, and the directness with which he brings the truth to the individual makes these sermons personal messages indeed"—Christian Advocate. Net $1.25

G. CAMPBELL MORGAN

The Teaching of Christ

A Companion Volume to "The Crises of the Christ."

"One does not read far before he is amazed at the clear and logical grasp Dr. Morgan has upon divine truths. Here is a work that may profitably occupy a prominent place in the minister's library."—Augsburg Teacher. Net $1.50

CAROLINE ABBOT STANLEY

The Keeper of the Vineyard

A Tale of the Ozarks

This story of a "return to nature," like the author's "Master of the Oaks," pulsates with real life. The scene lies in the Missouri Ozarks, a melting pot wherein those who seek the solace of nature and a living from the soil fuse their lives with the natives of the Hills in the common quest for liberty and education, love and life. Illustrated, $1.25 net

Stevenson's Kidnapped

Beautifully illustrated with Full-Color Pictures and Lining Paper, by N. C. WYETH

All the most striking characters and scenes of the famous story are brilliantly pictured, but the "end-piece," says Mr. Wyeth, "shows the brig Covenant passing the headlands of western Scotland—perhaps in the vicinity of 'Torren Rocks.' It was with the greatest difficulty that I found an authentic merchant brig of 1750, but finally found one in the archives of the Essex Museum in Salem, Mass."—which matter-of-fact statement throws a spark of light upon the methods of a true illustrator.

RELIGIOUS LEADERS OF TO-DAY

THE LATEST HODDER & STOUGHTON BOOKS

OUT OF THE ABYSS. The Biography of One Who Was Dead and Is Alive Again.

With introduction by Dr. George Steven, author of "The Psychology of the Christian Soul" and a special American introduction by Gipsy Smith. Graphically it narrates one of the most tremendous struggles through which a human soul ever passed. It takes a leading place as another extraordinary proof of the efficacy of conversion in rebuilding character, into new moral strength. 12mo. Net, $1.25

CHRIST IN THE SOCIAL ORDER. By W. M. Clow, D.D.

A brave attempt to interpret the mind of Christ in such a way that it may give us a solution to the crying needs of to-day. Vital and sane, yet pulsating with humanitarian passion. 12mo. Net, $1.25

THE UNWRITTEN SAYINGS OF OUR LORD.

By Prof. David Smith, D.D.

The finding of other versions of the Gospels, or of reported sayings of Christ which have come down by oral tradition, have gone far to increase our knowledge of his teachings. In this book they are gathered up and given their place in relation to the Gospels. The result is a book stimulating in thought and full of spiritual suggestions. 12mo. Net, $1.00

THE FACTS OF LIFE IN RELATION TO FAITH.

By P. Carnegie Simpson, D.D.

An extremely modern book by a prophet of the possible. He is doing for this twentieth century what Matthew Arnold did for the nineteenth—sifting out the essentials from the shams. 12mo. Net, $1.25

THE EXPOSITOR'S TREASURY OF CHILDREN'S SERMONS. Edited by Sir W. Robertson Nicoll, M. A., LL. D., and Jane Stoddart.

The sermons contained in this volume represent selections from the work of the best preachers to children during the past thirty years. They are so selected as to cover the entire Bible in sequence, from Genesis to the Book of Revelation; they form in themselves a Children's Bible Commentary. Each sermon is headed according to subject, then follows the text and then the discussion. The volume contains nearly eight hundred pages. THE TREASURY is a splendid companion to THE EXPOSITOR'S DICTIONARY OF TEXTS. Special prospectus mailed upon request. Large Quarto. Net, $5.00

THINKING BLACK. Twenty-two Years Without a Break in the Long Grass of Central Africa. By Dan Crawford, F.R.G.S.

A brilliant and original book which will take its place among the Classics of the Missions. What Paton did for the New Hebrides, Cary for India, and Mackey for Uganda, Crawford has done for Central Africa.
With many illustrations and maps. Octavo. Net, $2.00

LIFE'S FLOODTIDE. By J. Stuart Holden, M.A.

These sermons are entirely practical in their aim. They deal with the difficulties of the ordinary man in his living of the Christian life. 12mo. Net, $1.25

THE TEACHING OF PAUL IN TERMS OF THE PRESENT DAY. By Sir William Ramsay, D.C.L., LL.D., D.D.

The influence of St. Paul in modern Christianity is becoming more and more appreciated. Sir William Ramsay by following in the Apostle's footsteps, among the same people, in our own day, has come very close to the influences which formed the sympathies of his spiritual culture. 8vo. Net, $3.00

THE HISTORY AND LITERATURE OF THE EARLY CHURCH. By Prof. James Orr, D.D.

A concise summary of a crowded period of history which lays stress upon great personalities and paints an impressive background to Christianity. 12mo. Net, $1.00

THROUGH NIGHT TO MORNING. By A. C. Dixon, B.A., D.D.

Sermons which are frankly evangelistic, comprising a volume of optimism and courage which is calculated to give to life's disorganized thoughts a new and more valuable direction. 12mo. Net, $1.25

THE CHALLENGE OF CHRIST. By J. Howard B. Masterman, M.A.

THE CHALLENGE OF CHRIST is the challenge to faith. This book is a piece of special pleading for the value of the miraculous in religion and modern life. 12mo. Net, $1.25

THE BOOK OF GOD'S PROVIDENCE. By John T. Faris, D.D.

Here is a philosophy, a rule for happy living which all the world is seeking—a proof of the sanity of trusting in God. 12mo. Net, $1.00

Worth-While Books for Christmas

All the Days of My Life

An Autobiography

By AMELIA E. BARR

Dr. Henry van Dyke says in a letter to Mrs. Barr:

"You are not afraid to speak frankly of those spiritual experiences which are the most potent factors of life. Your victory as a woman, your success as a writer, have been won through faith."

IMPORTANT NEW FALL PUBLICATIONS

THE WALLET OF TIME

Personal, Biographical and Critical Reminiscence of the American Theatre, 1791-1912.

By WILLIAM WINTER

Two volumes, boxed. Price, $10.00 net. Postage, 50 cents extra.

A Special Edition only, strictly limited to 1,250 copies. Printed on pure rag paper, made for this edition. Beautifully illustrated.

To read this work is to read the personal as well as professional history of many of the greatest Players who have appeared on the American stage. Personal recollections and theatrical history. Managers and management, plays and dramatists are discussed and depicted, as well as actors and acting.

A truly sumptuous work in two large volumes, containing upward of 1,300 pages handsomely illustrated, representing the best in American literature. There is no lover of the theater in this country—whether it be college professor, dramatic critic, actor or clergyman—man or woman—who can afford to be unfamiliar with the contents of this monumental work.

Louis XI and Charles the Bold

By Lieut.-Col. ANDREW C. P. HAGGARD, D.S.O.

Large 8vo, gilt top. Illustrated. Price, $4.00 net. Postage, 18 cents.

Colonel Haggard's story of the cruel and treacherous son of Charles VII. of France, told in his inimitable style, makes fascinating reading.

Social Sanity

By SCOTT NEARING

12mo. Cloth, $1.25 net. Postage, 12 cents.

A timely and able book by a writer well known for his writing on Sociological and Economic Questions. In his book Professor Nearing treats of certain influences and problems of the greatest importance to our present-day civilization.

The Panama Canal

By EARLE HARRISON

Size 7½x11½. $1.00 net. Postage, 8 cents.

Illustrated in full color by color photography from the original autochrome photographs by Mr. Harrison. These sixteen pictures of the Panama Canal, taken direct by the author for Scribner's Magazine and printed under his supervision, are the most beautiful ever issued on this subject.

The Spider's Web

By REGINALD WRIGHT KAUFFMAN

Author of "The House of Bondage," etc. Illustrated by Jean Paleologue. 12mo. $1.35 net. Postage, 12 cents.

A story in every way equal to "The House of Bondage," which was a masterpiece of narrative. This new story is written in the best manner of the author, and while the story is the important thing, the incidental causes that go to support the tale throughout are matters of great moment to all Americans.

The New Dawn

By AGNES C. LAUT

Illustrated by Jean Paleologue. 12mo. $1.35 net. Postage, 12 cents.

We are always sure of a good story from Miss Laut, and the present story is about the biggest thing she has ever done. There is a vastness in conception and a concentration in strength in the narrative that is remarkable.

The Memoirs of Mimosa

Edited by ANNE ELLIOT

12mo. Illustrated Jacket. $1.25 net. Postage, 10 cents.

The intimate confession of a brilliant yet undisciplined woman, who resolves "to live every moment of her life," and succeeds in doing so. One of the most delightful books of the year.

The Cur and the Coyote

By EDWARD PEPLE

Author of "A Night Out," "The Prince Chap." Illustrated by R. L. Goldberg. 50 cents net. Postage, 5 cents.

The thousands of readers who have so often laughed over "A Night Out" will gladly welcome this new story by the same author.

When Mother Lets Us Act

By STELLA G. S. PERRY

Around the Shop

Every once in a while the Around-the-Shop Man runs across the chap who makes a profession of telling of "the good old days"; he goes about sighing and good-old-daysing until most of the folks with whom he comes in contact conclude there was at least one exception to the "good" days. Certainly we heard one man ask him the date of his birth. The Around-the-Shop Man delights in noncroaking, here-we-are-today reminiscences, but the "what-are-we-coming-to?" sort invariably serve to him as a reminder of other engagements. So he'll try to keep out of that class in this little screed.

We never were specially in love with the old organ that stood in the corner of the parlor. When the Around-the-Shop Man, as a boy, endeavored to reveal his soul by playing on as many keys as possible at once, with all the stops out and the bellows fit to burst, some unsympathetic person was sure to make discouraging remarks.

When the girls drifted into the front room after supper, or after dinner on Sunday, and one of them began to sound a few chords and finally launched into a real tune, the Around-the-Shop Man to Be wasn't specially joyful. Pretty soon all the others of the family were about the organ. There would be a gradual working up to the point where everybody joined in, then sister would get more particular in her selections and the group would dwindle until finally she was alone and it was time for something else.

Wasn't very exciting, not even interesting, to a small boy. But it wasn't the things the small boy would have put into his diary (if he could have kept one) that have kept alive his vision of home. These family "sings" are to him as of only yesterday. Maybe such gatherings are still to be found quite as generally as in time of yore; maybe the songs of this day are the sort that one would be proud to recite. We hope so. But——

It seems almost a sacrilege to say it, but there have been times when the Around-the-Shop Man, while the minister and choir were singing and the congregation were holding the hymnbooks in their hands, has thought that if the minister had announced a silly, vulgar ragtime song of the day instead of an inspiring hymn the auditorium would be filled with noise if not with music. The A.-t.-S. Man judged so by the sort of songs he had heard sung in the homes of the people.

Still, there are the good new days. There are more good songs, good singers and good people than ever. We venture to say that the folk who really like to read The Continent don't care much for such songs as—oh, well, why name them? If one's taste is for clean, bright, helpful reading matter it is not likely that trashy songs will have much appeal.

"The most important book of the year"
The Life of Col. Roosevelt

THEODORE ROOSEVELT
AN AUTOBIOGRAPHY

In this stirring autobiography, replete with the most varied and interesting experiences, Col. Roosevelt writes intimately of his life, his philosophy and the achievements which have helped to mold his remarkable career. During many years no other single personality of the present day has attracted such general attention in national and world-wide policies, and no more vivid picture of contemporaneous history probably will ever be written than Col. Roosevelt's own story of his life. In its interpretation of Col. Roosevelt's striking personality, this work is not only of national but of international importance. The book is handsomely bound and is unusually attractive, with illustrations of portraits, facsimiles of various documents, pictures of buildings, localities and other interesting and appropriate matter.

Decorated cover. Gilt top. Richly illustrated. Octavo. $2.50 net; sent postpaid, $2.75.

The Sovereignty of God

"All that which the Father giveth me shall come unto me."

Do not most people who try to quote this clause from the sixth chapter of John say, "All whom the Father giveth"? Or even if they quote it correctly, is not "all whom" the sense in their minds? But "all that which" carries a different meaning.

John, the beloved disciple, was, as far as literary education went, "an unlearned and ignorant man," as the Jewish scribes observed when he stood with Peter before the Sanhedrin. But he was a man of precise thinking, who knew what he wanted to say, and long before he wrote his gospel, life in the cultured Greek city of Ephesus had given him an excellent working mastery of the Greek language—the most perfect instrument for exact expression of thought which the human mind ever had at its disposal.

So it was by no accident or blunder, we may be sure, that John wrote "all that which" instead of "all whom" in this passage. It needed "all that which" to make plain just the sense which he remembered from the words his Master spoke in Aramaic on that unforgettable day "beside the Syrian sea" when the high discourse of Jesus with the multitudes concerned the Bread of Life.

Not only of the Bread of Life did the Lord speak that day, however, but also, in a calm and lofty confidence, of the sure triumph of his mission in the world as Messiah. Then he opened wide the gates of his kingdom for everyone allured by his purposes to enter in and share his sure victory.

"All whom the Father giveth me" would have signified an allotment of individual followers destined to adhere to the person and cause of Jesus. But whatever of such teaching may appear in other parts of Scripture, that is not the point of this saying. "All that which the Father giveth me" proves that the Master's thought at the moment was not directly of individual disciples but rather of the sum total of his task as Saviour of the world.

This sense of his meaning is confirmed by noting that the word "come" used as the sentence is completed—"All that which the Father giveth me shall come unto me"—is not the common word for "come." It is not the word translated "cometh" in the very next line. This latter ordinary verb is full of the literal idea of motion and approach; but the verb John chose to interpret the thought of the Saviour about the "coming" of what the Father gives, is a word more comprehensive of development and consummation—more like "come to pass" than simply "come."

The gift which the Lord Jesus received from the Father in the incarnation—the gift which was still being so poured into his life that he could only use a present tense in speaking of it—was a mission and commission to redeem the world.

Of that mission he was very sure, and yet in that incomprehensible mingling of human emotions with his divine consciousness, even the Son of God, "in all points tempted like as we are," could not wholly escape the shadow of disheartenment as he faced the stupidity and misunderstanding and unfaith of his own people.

The sign he had done in the physical feeding of the five thousand had, so far as the immediate effect counted, gone the wrong way; it had brought to him a loyalty so worldly, fleshly and self-calculating that he had been compelled to refuse it. Even the most sympathetic onlooker might have failed to find a cheery omen.

What then could the Lord say as against this sodden cloud of discouragement settling around him—say to others or say to his own soul?

He could turn only to that assurance which has ever been the ultimate refuge of trustful souls from the hour when Abraham believed in God until this present moment:

He could trust—and bid men trust—in God's omnipotent sovereignty over all that is.

The Almighty Father in heaven is he whose will cannot be defeated. That foundation stands as sure when the clouds are dark as when the sun shines.

And that in substance was what the courageous and unfaltering Jesus of Nazareth said to the multitudes that springtide day on the shore of Gennesaret. He had been given a message from his Father—a task to do, a purpose of eternal providence to accomplish—and the Father would not let it fail:

"All that which the Father giveth me shall come unto me."

It was the Lord Christ's own echo of the glorious confidence which the Spirit of God taught centuries before to the prophet who beheld in vision the suffering and triumphant Servant:

"He shall see of the travail of his soul and be satisfied."

It was the same mystic rest amid conflict and sight through darkness and steadfastness in calamity that humanity achieves when it accepts the one faith which includes all other faiths—trust in the beneficent and sufficient omnipotence of God.

From all the world's history past and unto all the world's history future, the one mold and matrix of heroism and grandeur among men is and must ever be this vital sense of a sovereign God.

It was so with the Son of God on earth. It is so with earth's own lesser sons.

But that was not all that Jesus of Nazareth said that day.

He not only knew the eternal surety of his Father; he knew the surety of the Father in himself.

In the same breath that he told of a sovereign God that could be depended on in heaven, he proclaimed himself a sovereign Saviour to be depended on in the earth:

"Him that cometh unto me I will in no wise cast out."

Jesus is as sure as God!

There is no vast, generalizing, neuter phrase here; the grammar of it is individualizing, personal, singling out each man who listens, adjuring him to act forthwith and for himself—"him that cometh."

How thrilling the straight-out appeal to a man's free will to decide his own place in God's victorious Messiah plan! Who is it who will choose this day to share certain triumph by joining himself to a certainly faithful and certainly able Saviour?

"Whosoever will, let him come." And coming let him be well assured that the Christ will not in any wise cast him out—will never reject him, will never lose him, will never fail him, will surely carry him on into the culminating glory of that day when the redeeming Son shall present before the throne of God his completed work of redemption, saying:

"This is the will of him that sent me, that of all that which he hath given me I should lose nothing."

Congress Begins New Session; Currency Bill First

Ending of the special session and beginning of the regular session of Congress followed one upon the other with scarcely a ripple this week, and the national legislators had no chance to go home to spend their mileage allowance or to look after their political fences. The word went forth, presumably from the White House, that the currency bill must be passed—not "should" but "must." In accordance with this mandate the Democratic majority of the senate decided upon a stern program: The senators should sit each day from 10 a. m. until 6 p. m. and from 8 p. m. until 11 p. m., day in and day out, Christmas Day only excluded, until the currency bill became a law. A series of party caucuses was planned in order to smooth out the Democratic differences of opinion regarding the Owen-Glass measure, and it was hoped to present practically a united front against the Republican-Progressive minority.

In its original form the bill passed the lower house September 18 with only 86 negative votes. Since that time the house has been, for the most part, marking time while the senate committee on banking and currency publicly and privately considered the bill from all possible angles. Bankers, business men and economists have given their views and the senators have had an opportunity to become thoroughly educated on monetary problems. Therefore the party conference is being easily defended against the charge of undue haste because of the decision to force an early vote.

Efforts to Adjust Differences in Monetary Views

Three drafts for a currency act were presented to the senate by the committee, including the house bill. The divergence in the other two drafts represented two schools of thought, one part of the committee believing in a central bank administered by a centralized board and the remainder proposing to establish numerous comparatively independent district banks under local district boards. The President is believed to favor the latter idea.

Senator Owen opened the debate last week, emphasizing the point that delay was extremely costly to the business interests of the country. Senator Hitchcock, who sided with the Republican members of the committee in opposing the administration champions, followed. He favored not more than four rather than a dozen regional banks.

Even antiadministration newspapers willingly admit that the proposed legislation is "four-fifths sound," and that some of the pending amendments go far toward remedying the remaining one-fifth of error.

As soon as the all-important currency question is disposed of Congress will be ready to take up, probably some time early next year, other highly important legislation which has been waiting, such as trust legislation, government ownership of railways, the naval building program, a system of rural credits and the causes of the high cost of living.

Pan-American Thanksgiving Mass Criticised

For the fourth year a Pan-American Thanksgiving mass was held in Washington last Thursday. The service took place in St. Patrick's Catholic church, which was specially decorated with the United States and Latin-American flags, and was attended by President Wilson, Secretary Bryan and several other cabinet officers, Chief Justice White and Justice McKenna of the supreme court, senators, representatives and public officials, and the diplomats from Latin-America. Cardinal Gibbons was present and the sermon was preached by Bishop Currier of Cuba. The bishop compared peace and war, and decried war as "the natural enemy of that which is good and true," and subversive of the moral order. President Taft set the precedent which Mr. Wilson followed in attending.

Protestant clergymen of the capital, led by Dr. R. H. McKim, Episcopalian, adopted resolutions several days previous to the service denouncing the custom of having public officials attend a Catholic mass, for the reason that the fact is made use of to give color to a Romanist claim that this is the national celebration of Thanksgiving Day, the mass being made to appear as an official function.

The language of the protest was, in part, as follows:

"We protest against the attempt to convert our national Thanksgiving Day into a Roman Catholic festival in a service entirely out of harmony with the history or the genius of our country and the spirit and purpose of the day. We desire to give voice to the widespread feeling of indignation among millions of Protestants of America against the efforts of the Roman press and the Roma hierarchy to exploit the presence of our chief magistrate and som of his cabinet (which we are convinced has only been intended a an act of courtesy and good will) for the purpose of glorifying th Roman Catholic Church and giving this service an official characterization it does not and cannot possess."

Mexican Revolutionists Win More Victories

Mexican federals met defeat last week in a desperate effort t retake Juarez and regain the ground lost to the Northern revolutionists under General Francisco Villa. Villa, who is popularly known as "Pancho," and his soldiers were victorious at every turn and proudly announced that after capturing Chihuahua they would march on to Mexico City. Villa's recent achievements eclipsed the older and less aggressive General Carranza, but unfortunately he seems to have little besides aggressiveness to recommend him. Apparently he is a younger and more ruffianly edition of the Huerta style of fighter and his successes may prove of questionable value to his country. He boasts that his battles are the greatest in America "since Gettysburg."

In spite of Northern reverses and the menace of Zapatista and his bands in the South, the Mexican capital was reported to be carefree and gay. One correspondent declared that only 2 per cent of the population talked politics, but bull fights continued to attract large attendance and interest. This spirit of indifference was not shared by foreign residents and capitalists. The chief of the latter, Lord Cowdray, asked the United States to guard his imperiled oil interests in the Tampico district. Cowdray denied that he was giving Huerta financial aid, and also published the statement that he had abandoned his lately acquired concessions in the republic of Colombia. The extensive Colombian concessions, including the right to dig an interoceanic canal, disturbed the Wilson administration.

A well-known French newspaper, The Paris Temps, in an editorial last Saturday urged the great European powers to take concerted action with the United States to compel all parties in Mexico to lay down their arms.

World Asked to Note Russian Prison Conditions

A protest against the condition of Russian prisons and the treatment of prisoners and exiles, signed by several hundred prominent politicians, artists and men of letters, was published throughout Europe last week. The protest asserts that since the czar's manifesto of 1905, which promised constitutional liberty to the people of Russia, over 40,000 persons have been sentenced for political offenses, of whom 3,000 were executed, and more than 10,000 buried in prison mortuaries. In a majority of cases the convictions were by courts-martial, not by the ordinary law courts. It is further alleged that undernourishment amounting to literal starvation and inconceivable overcrowding in cells where the hard floor is the only bed, coupled with revolting treatment of prisoners, make the prisons veritable hells. Prisoners have become the victims of all kinds of epidemics and prisons have become centers of infection. The statement adds:

"The handling of prisoners is terrible, both in the prisons and the detention houses. Every year the duma hears of tortures inflicted during examination, the flogging of men and women, and other mistreatment. The result has been an epidemic of suicides, as the prisoners conclude that this is their only freedom, hoping that thereby they will call attention to their awful fate."

In conclusion the signers demand an investigation of these conditions, basing the plea on the principle that what happens in Russia can no longer be considered Russia's business, but belongs to the whole civilized world.

Support for Anglo-American Exposition in 1914

In connection with the celebration of the centenary of peace between the United States and Great Britain there is to be held in London in 1914 an Anglo-American exposition, and in behalf of the exposition an appeal for support was last week issued by the American vice presidents. They are Nicholas Murray Butler, president of Columbia University; Joseph H. Choate, James B. Forgan, David R. Francis, Alva B. Johnson, A. Lawrence Lowell and Samuel Mather—a broadly representative group. They explain that not only will the signing of the Treaty of Ghent (which ended the war of 1812) be celebrated, but also the development and spread among the masses of the people of both nations of that spirit of mutual understanding and good will "which makes the idea of armed conflict between them as abhorrent as its existence is unthinkable."

It is planned to present a historic summary of what the two nations have achieved in relation to art, education, science, industry d commerce. Committees on both sides of the Atlantic are at rk on the project, and it is hoped to strengthen the present bond commercial union between the United States and the united ngdom as well as insure the continuance of peace.

Another suggestion which is being considered by the American mmittee for the celebration of the 100th anniversary of peace is e for the establishing and maintaining in New York of "museums peaceful arts" modeled after institutions in Paris, Berlin and enna. A score of buildings are called for, to house permanent hibits, also books and periodicals, and assembly auditoriums, all r the use of schools and colleges and the general public. The imated cost is $20,000,000.

ny Saloons Closed in Iowa and Ohio

Saloons in Des Moines, the capital of Iowa, nearly a hundred in mber, were suddenly and summarily closed a few days ago folving a decision of the supreme court of the state. The court held at the "consent petitions," under which the saloons had been operng for two years, were insufficient to comply with the law in imrtant technical respects. The saloon men applied for a rehearing, t there is said to be little prospect of reopening the case. The wa superintendent of the Anti-Saloon League stated that the deion would result in the closing of saloons in the larger cities of state. The Des Moines liquor men are circulating new consent itions to which 9,058 names must be obtained, but the foes of cohol believe this number of valid signatures cannot be obtained.

More than 3,300 saloons in Ohio, it is estimated, have just been rced out of business by the liquor license law, which limits the mber of grog shops in wet territory to one for each 500 of popuion. For the first time in fifty years all saloons in Cincinnati re reported closed last Sunday.

bor Troubles Force Out Indianapolis Mayor

There was a disagreeable echo of the recent traction strike in dianapolis last week, when the mayor, Samuel L. Shank, was comled to resign to avoid having to face impeachment charges. The lice department had become demoralized and commercial condins unsettled as a result of the mayor's acts of omission and mmission, but the acting mayor hopefully announced that he uld protect life and property and preserve order at any cost.

Ex-Mayor Shank, who enjoyed experience as an auctioneer bee reaching the executive office, has had a picturesque career. had a conflict with the ministers of the city regarding immoral sorts, and achieved notoriety by his handling of the saloon probn. Saloonkeepers who violated the laws were brought before mayor and their licenses suspended for long or short periods. one case the license was withdrawn until the liquor seller could ow that he had attended church—an interesting even though tralegal precaution. In 1911 the mayor made a well-advertised ht in the interests of consumers by importing and selling cards of potatoes at 75 cents a bushel when the retail price was arly twice as much. Fruit, vegetables and poultry were also sold reduced prices.

eatest Money-Raising Feat in America

In a newspaper interview at Washington on Thanksgiving Day, cretary of the Navy Daniels expressed the opinion that the one ng which had made most significant the Thanksgiving festival of 13 was the completion of the four million dollar fund for the ung Men's and Young Women's Christian Associations in Manttan and the Bronx in New York City. This was an indication the remarkable national interest attracted by this metropolitan ney-raising campaign. George W. Perkins, the chairman of the tral campaign committee, said he was particularly happy over result because he thought it would prove to the nation that New rk is not simply a cold-hearted center of speculation and moneyking which the country at large generally conceives it to be.

An interesting personal side of the achievement is the fact that this was the greatest of all the long series of victories for Charles S. Ward and his "whirlwind method"—based mainly on keeping ten-men teams of solicitors competing with one another and displaying big clock-faces in prominent places to keep the public informed of the progress of the fund. Mr. Ward invented this remarkable plan to meet the necessities of his own association when he was local secretary of the Young Men's Christian Association in Minneapolis a little over ten years ago. Since that time he has by the same method raised more than twenty-five million dollars in the leading American cities, and has never been defeated in such an effort anywhere in the United States. Indeed, he was not defeated when he tried it in London, although the sum was not reached within the campaign period set. But the impetus of the campaign activity brought in the total within a few months after.

The New York effort, however, had a dismal prospect toward the end of the fifteen days assigned for the campaign. The climax was set for midnight of Tuesday, November 25. On Sunday night the clock hands were only $40,000 past the three million mark. On Tuesday night when the time was up, $573,000 was still lacking. But it was then decided to extend the effort for twenty-four hours longer, and on Thanksgiving eve at the Hotel Manhattan, the gifts were totaled up at $4,052,501. The odd dollar was the gift of a janitor on 40th street who forewent his Thanksgiving turkey in order to contribute to the fund. The largest givers were Cleveland H. Dodge and his sister, Miss Grace H. Dodge, the latter the president of the national board of the Young Women's Christian Association. Their original subscription was half a million, but in the stress of final effort, they increased their gifts to make a total of $625,000.

Lawrance Advanced to World Responsibility

Heretofore the World's Sunday School Association has been little more than a committee of arrangements for holding world's conventions which, meeting in succession in Jerusalem, Rome and Zurich, have afforded inspiration to many Christian travelers and have widely disseminated missionary conceptions of the Sunday school's place in general religious work. But the very success of these assemblages has laid upon the association which promoted them the necessity of undertaking larger executive responsibilities. The ideals generated by the conventions must now be carried out.

So it has become evident that the World's Association could not longer continue to be, as it has been in effect, a department of the American Sunday school organization. In particular, an executive force of its own has become necessary. And after earnest consideration of this situation, the outcome is an agreement, consented to by the American leaders under which the International (or American) Association gives up to the world work its brilliant general secretary, Marion Lawrance.

The International Association has just arranged with the Anti-Saloon League a plan of cooperation in working through Sunday schools to secure children's signatures to the total abstinence pledge. This will eliminate a confusion which has arisen through the simultaneous advance of the two organizations to this same object. The International Association is seeking for a competent secretary to put in charge of its temperance work, as it also needs a man to direct the movement for adult Bible classes and still another man for publicity work.

Yuan Boldly Extols Confucian Religion

That Dr. Chen's movement to unify China by adopting Confucianism as a state religion has really been promoted through a secret understanding with President Yuan Shih Kai, is a suspicion strengthened by a proclamation which Yuan has just issued, much in the style and tenor of the emperor's edicts in monarchical times. This proclamation has no apparent occasion and does not come to any specific point. But it is interpreted as being the probable forerunner of a more specific decree proclaiming Confucianism as China's official faith, provided this tentative praise of it does not arouse too much opposition. Yuan says:

"The words of Confucius comprise a doctrine of unequaled wisdom which is recognized as such by many foreigners as well as Chinese; deep as the ocean, sufficient although the ages change, permanent as the sun and the moon that cross the heavens and as the rivers that flow on the earth."

The Christian missionaries and Chinese church people are bitterly disappointed at Yuan's reversal of position since he invited Christian prayer a few months ago. The situation has driven Christians of both Protestant and Romanist communions into a remarkable alliance with Mohammedans and Buddhists in a league formed to uphold religious equality in China.

The Joy of Difficulty

MOST OF US know what difficulty means; some of us have not learned the joy of it. No one can teach us, we can only learn it for ourselves. When Westmoreland, the evening before the battle with the French, was wishing for 10,000 of the men in England who were doing no work that day, Shakespeare has Henry V. exclaim against the wish. He would not have another man there to share the shame if they were defeated nor to share the glory if they were victorious. Rather, he would have every man who was fearful or counted it too hard a task leave the army, that none might be left but those who were ready for real hardship and struggle. The day would come, he felt, when men who were lying abed that day in England would curse their fate in not being there to fight. The day did come, even as he said. Men who shun the battle miss the glory and the victory. Men who will not share the difficulty have no part in the reward. Willingness to escape the hardship is always short sighted. It saves us today only to lose us tomorrow. We save our skins and lose our souls.

This is the word that needs to be sounded to men who think it is hard to be a Christian. So it is; let us never discount it. That is the way in which Robert Browning begins and closes his poem called "Easter Day." In it he sounds a clear message. It is hard to be a Christian in many senses, but that is what makes it so well worth while to be a Christian. The poem includes the dream of a man who thought he was allowed to have a smooth, untroubled life, to have the whole world and to be unconcerned about another world. It seemed too good to be true. But when he set out on the new path, he found it tame and lifeless, found it lacking something which his soul called for. The better self of him called for warfare, for struggle. He was happy that he could "be crossed and thwarted as a man, not left in God's contempt apart, with ghastly, smooth life, dead at heart." Here is a great, high life to which we are called. The road leads up God's heights by many a steep way. Let him who will live in the easy lowlands, where the fevers of the soul are born. The men who know God will follow up the hard way.

We need to sound the same note of joy in the tasks of the Christian life. All that is needed to make some men truly heroic is to attack some real need of their fellows that will drain their life blood. It is a trenchant comment on the weak point of many of our church societies, whose main purpose seems to be to have annual dinners or meetings which center around refreshments, that they are "in danger of eating their heads off." There is no note of the heroic or the difficult sounded. Let no man be deceived in that note. All men will not respond to it. Gideon tried it and lost the main part of his army. The main body of any army in the church or out of it will shy at it, if many of them do not even desert when they hear it. But the men who do things will hear it and rally to it.

A group of men concerned for the ministry sat talking earnestly of the future recently, when one of them said, "The appeal to young men in behalf of the ministry must now have a new note; the others have no more power." Pressed to state the new note, he gave an answer now familiar to all who know the young men of today: "It must be the note of the heroic." Other motives, if they ever did have any value, have none now. The advantages of the ministry do not now so surpass other callings as to mark it peculiarly. All later movements are tending to increase the burden on the true minister. One thing is left as an appeal—the chance to spend and be spent. If any man is strong enough to want the hard service, to do the difficult thing, here is his chance. Most of them will turn away from it on that account. Easy living has made them soft. Muscle and grip are gone. Money and the power it gives are attractive. But these are not the strong men to whom the appeal of the ministry will come with any power. These others will hear it and will face the task in true spirit. They may find their work elsewhere, but they will find it in fields which develop the same spirit, whether it is in commerce or professions or other service of the human life. These are the men who will do the things the world needs. They will undertake the difficult task and find joy in doing it.

Is Congregation Plus Church Necessary?

If there is to be found anywhere a plain, everyday Presbyterian layman who can follow out the distinction that ecclesiastical lawyers make between a local church and a local congregation, he is certainly a miracle of native understanding. In fact, The Continent doubts if there are very many ministers, specially trained though they are, who can keep the difference clear and straight through all the tangled questions that arise over church meetings and congregational meetings—which is which and when one should be the other The puzzle, of course, all springs out of a purpose to do justice to individuals who contribute to the support of the church but do no come to its communion. Such people—usually men of the "brother-in-law" relation to the church—are ordinarily in reasonable sympathy with the general ideals of the church and it seems only fair that they should have their voice in the use of church funds to which they often subscribe a very considerable part.

But how far shall the influence of men thus related to the church be permitted to extend? The broad principle of Presbyterian practice is that noncommunicant contributors should take part only in the temporal affairs of the church but should be excluded from its spiritual affairs. Therefore, property matters are to be considered in congregational meeting and religious matters in church meeting. It is an easy application of this rule to have elders and deacons elected in church meeting and trustees in congregational meeting But when it comes to calling a new pastor, who can say dogmatically to which category this subject belongs? The pastor is certainly a spiritual officer and in that aspect his call ought to come from the church, but his salary must be paid from the "temporalities," which are administered by the congregation. On the straigh theory of the thing, therefore, right to vote on a pastoral call mus be extended to a considerable number of persons who have never openly professed their faith in the Christian religion which the pastor is called to preach. To say the best of it, this comes out to a religious anomaly and may not inconceivably result in giving preference in the pulpit to men who preach a weakened religion over men who seek to declare the whole counsel of God.

Would not this whole matter be dealt with in a way more becoming to the superior claims of religion if church law were so radically revised that all power, both spiritual and temporal, in any loca church were definitely lodged with those who have openly professed Christianity and been received into Christian communion? Is no the supposed connection between giving money and voting on how i should be spent, rather a fictitious connection after all? Certainly there can be no inherent right involved in it if the church, before the money is given, flatly makes known its refusal to admit any voting power carried by the gift. The Young Men's Christian Association does this very thing most steadfastly. It solicits contributions from millions of men to whom it gives in advance frank notice that they will not be permitted to have any part in th government of the institution which they are asked thus to aid. I the church were as independent about the matter as the Young Men's Christian Association is, its experience would doubtles parallel association experience in demonstrating that nonreligiou men give to religious institutions even more readily when such institutions stand boldly on their own feet and offer no concessions

Era of Education in Temperance Reform

Retrospect of the great recent temperance convention at Columbus is likely to persuade the careful observer that the most significant reason for valuing its influence optimistically is a facto that few reports of the occasion have emphasized. This factor wa a new note of educational purpose. That tone was heard in th more thoughtful speeches of the program, found expression in th platform of resolutions adopted and became the dominant conception of the "get together convention" which followed the regula sessions of the Anti-Saloon League. Many signs in fact demonstrated a fresh faith that a vast host of Americans, now addicted t liquor, can by genial and kindly argument be won to believe tha liquor is really their foe and the foe of the nation.

Heretofore the great prevailing theory of temperance campaign has been that the temperance reform is necessarily a war, and th way to fight it through is to get a law against the saloon and bea over the head with it all the great mass of people who are disposed to patronize the saloon. Moreover, this war, it has been imagined, was to be won the quicker in proportion to the amount o hell-fire denunication with which its big guns were shotted. Bu war begets hate and revenge in fields of moral reformation as elsewhere, and the club of the law, where it has been used, has cowe rather than cured the devotees of King Alcohol. The way of education is the better way by far, and if it sometimes seems the longe way to a show of results, it is certainly not a longer path to the goo final result of a nation joyful and satisfied in a temperate life.

To this ideal of the way to win, the Columbus convention withou doubt imparted a very large increase of impetus. A multitud brought away from that assemblage a new dream of a respectfu literature which will gain for prohibition out of the ranks of its present enemies a host of those friends that it will need, if not for its enactment at least for successful enforcement. The sober nation will come at length only when the mass of Americans have been converted to a wish to be sober. No doubt in the end there will be some whom nothing but the club can convert, but certainly the aim of real Christian statesmanship will be the reduction of that incorrigible remnant to the least possible fraction, before the club is used.

The practical expression of all this ought soon to be seen in the appearance of an abundant supply of temperance writing in the languages of all the immigrant peoples that have come of late years to help make the future of America. Especially ought this sort of literature to abound in the German language. The assumption that the body of German citizenship in America is destined to stand by the saloon to the last ditch, is a most unfair reflection on German brains and German sincerity. As a mass, Germans are no more friends of intemperance than any other people, and if dealt with by fair and respectful means, the German vote ought in the final accounting on the temperance issue to turn by large majority to the anti-saloon side.

An Architectural Marvel of Completeness

Whatever may remain to be said after its dedication concerning the wonderful new edifice of the Fourth Presbyterian church of Chicago, it is possible already to say that in proportions ~~and~~ ~~plan~~ning it is a masterpiece of modern church building. The Continent believes that when finished it will without doubt stand as the most complete example of all-around church equipment to be found anywhere in the world. The comprehensiveness of thought which built up the structure in imagination before its foundation was laid is of itself a miracle of Christian vision. Nothing that a church can do to serve its community seems to have been forgotten.

The spiritual emphasis happily goes before all else. That sense of social duty which in its extreme pressure has turned many recent churches from their proper character as houses of worship into mere social beehives, has been most discerningly governed by the builders of Fourth church. The noble sanctuary of the Chicago edifice will completely dominate the whole pile. Nobody will doubt that it is a church. And moreover the appeal to worship will show in every line of the stately cathedral-like room. Even filled with scaffolding as it still is, the vast nave awes and humbles the onlooker. When it has been actually consecrated to worship, its reverend dignity will forbid even the most specious-minded to dub it an "auditorium"—that word of all too prevalent use which betrays how far the average Protestant congregation has wandered from the inspiration and experience of worship.

But though the social task of the church has thus been put irrevocably subordinate, it has yet been wonderfully magnified. Provision for every namable phase of social ministry has been wrought into the maze of rooms and apartments occupying two sides of the beautiful quadrangle. None of these is yet quite finished or furnished, but their manifold values are already apparent. The Sunday school building embodies the ultimate requirements deemed ideal by the most expert thought of the times on religious education. The men's club is a miniature Young Men's Christian Association—though not so very miniature at that. The women's club copies with equal adaptation the ideals of the Young Women's Christian Association. The social rooms include a dining hall worthy of an Oxford college. The manse houses the pastor and his family beneath the same room with the church. The church offices are equipped like the headquarters of some great modern business.

All in all, Pastor Stone and his church officers (without the least danger of having to pay it) offer an extravagant reward to any one who could name a useful feature missing from the structure. One might almost excuse them if they should boast of having spoken a final word in church architecture. As a matter of fact, however, they are boasting not at all. Boasting is excluded by the ever present sense of measureless responsibility involved in the use of such a great plant. Fourth church under Dr. Stone's leadership has developed one supreme passion—the passion of serving its neighbors. In that spirit Dr. Stone and his coworkers are waiting to name the value of the church not by the amount which has been put into it but by the amount of good it does when once its manifold material provisions are being filled up with the pulsing life-blood of a living spirit of service.

—The question "What will the Board of Publication do with the Nashville publishing house?" occurred to many when the federal court put back into the church's possession the property which before union was the headquarters of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church. The riddle in the situation resulted from a difference between the publication policy which the Presbyterian Church has always pursued and that which was observed by the Cumberland denomination. The latter had built up an effective, modern printing plant, while the former has always done its official printing by contract with private firms. But happily it has proved possible to unite all the virtues of both methods in a most satisfactory adjustment at Nashville. The board will retain the ownership of the Nashville building, with a view to making it a center for all denominational work in that part of the South, but the printing machinery it has sold to Messrs. W. B. Baird and W. E. Ward, who were respectively the general manager and the cashier of the house under the pre-union Cumberland regime. These gentlemen are in such entire sympathy with all the Christian purposes for which the house was founded that their use of its equipment will be every whit as worthy of church traditions as if it continued under official control. Yet this happy result is secured without involving the Board of Publication in commercial risks. The solution is in every respect one that challenges the congratulation of the whole church.

—It seems likely that the house of bishops in the Episcopal Church has held its last secret sessions. Popular opinion that the bishops in General Convention ought to carry on their discussions and take their votes in public, as the deputies do, was very aggressive before the recent convention met, but the criticism of their secrecy has redoubled in vehemence since the convention adjourned. The principal organ of Episcopalianism in this country, The Churchman of New York, is leader of these complaints. The event which has most of all exasperated the laymen and parish ministry was the bishops' rejection of the resolution in which the deputies indorsed the Federal Council of Churches. If the bishops had argued out this question in public and let the deputies know what they were doing, this rejection would have been very much more amicably received. But in a very lordly fashion their episcopal majesties waited until the convention was almost over and then sent down to the deputies their unsatisfactory substitute, at a time when efficient conference between the houses was impossible. The Churchman begs the other denominations not to take this haughty attitude of the bishops as characteristic of the Episcopalian people.

—The week stretching from December 7 to December 14 will be a week for history to recall in far-away Burma. On and between these dates the Christians of Burma, who now number no inconsiderable host, will celebrate the centennial of the arrival on their shores of the first Christian apostle to their country—the immortally memorable missionary, Dr. Adoniram Judson. There will be services both in Rangoon, where Dr. Judson first preached, and in Moulmein, the scene of his later ministry. Five native women have been found who remember Dr. Judson, and they will have a prominent part in the ceremonies. The week's chief event will be the dedication of the memorial tower at Rangoon, which has been provided by Dr. J. Ackerman Coles of Newark, New Jersey.

—The service which Illinois women rendered against the saloon in recent local option voting in that state is accentuated by a remarkable resolution passed at the annual convention of the Illinois Federation of Women's Clubs. Judged by this resolution these club women have no talent for the use of evasive language. They do not even stop halfway to indorse local option but speak out at once for a prohibition state. Their significant action reads: "We, the delegates of the women's clubs of Illinois in convention assembled, place ourselves on record as opposed to the traffic in intoxicating liquors, and urge our sisters throughout the state to use at every opportunity their power at the ballot box to enroll Illinois in the growing list of dry states."

—The tendency of Germans, especially in the great cities of the German empire, to break their official connection with the state church, has developed lately in a way that uncovers a definite organization behind what seemed to be a spontaneous movement. This force is called the Non-Sectarian League, and its working membership is said to be composed largely of socialists and atheists A cable dispatch from Berlin alleges that on two days—November 20 and 21—5,500 persons in Berlin alone handed in to the authorities notice of their resignation from the established church. It is needless to say that if any such proportion of desertions keeps up, the movement will be most portentous.

DR. JOWETT'S MESSAGE

THERE IS A GREAT PASSAGE in the apostle Paul's second letter to the Corinthians in which he describes some of the primary characteristics of Christian behavior, characteristics which he exemplified in his own life. I should like to hear a great sermon on the Christian gentlemanliness of the apostle Paul, a sermon by some man like Horace Bushnell or John Henry Newman, which would unfold to us his grace, his courtesy, his noble and refined spirit and disposition. But the passage to which I refer gives us vivid glimpses of such a character, and suggests to us the atmosphere and bearing, the savor and sentiment of a true follower of Christ.

Not by "Fleshly Wisdom"

The apostle's description begins with a negative word which is pregnant with significance. Christian behavior is not in "fleshly wisdom." And what is "fleshly wisdom"? It is evidently wisdom of a very limited quality and degree. Compare it with a phrase I saw the other day which was used in disparagement of a certain prominent scholar—"classroom wisdom." It was wisdom having only the circuit of the classroom, having no movement or acquaintance with the real, practical wisdom of the world. Classroom wisdom is wisdom of a very crippled, because circumscribed, range; it is like the movement of a tethered air balloon. And "fleshly wisdom" is always wisdom limited by the flesh, moving in the realm and concerns of the body and not rising above it. "Fleshly wisdom" is the flesh-side of wisdom and not the spirit-side. It expresses itself in the emphasis of the under side of things and not of the upper side. It moves in the natural and not in the supernatural, it keeps within the confines of the body and does not roam out amid the mystic and imaginative realms and ranges of the soul.

Now how would this "fleshly wisdom" reveal itself in behavior among professedly Christian people? In the early church there were men and women who bore a Christian name and professed Christian life, but who moved in the range and incitement of "fleshly wisdom." First of all, "fleshly wisdom" emphasizes the denomination rather than Christ. In this very church at Corinth, to whom the letter was addressed, there was a party which said, "We are of Paul," while another party said, "We are of Cephas," while a third party said, "We are of Apollos." That is to say, the apostles were made more prominent than the Lord. The bottle was more obtruded than the essence. The individual dialect was made more important than the common speech. The under side of life with all its differences was magnified more than the upper side of life with its profound and vital agreements.

View of the Mountains Shut Out by Smoke

And this "fleshly wisdom" can assert itself in the church today. When we are its victims we think more of ecclesiasticism than we do of the invisible church. I am not disparaging denominationalism. It would be as absurd to do that as to disparage individual homes. But an aggressive denominationalism becomes filled with "fleshly wisdom" and tends to shut out the glory of the Lord. I saw an individual house at Brodick with its chimney on fire and the smoke shut out the view of the mountains. And denominationalism can become so obtrusive that it eclipses the Lord himself.

And in the second place "fleshly wisdom" emphasizes the beautiful more than the spiritual. That would be a great temptation in ancient Greece, where outward grace and charm had such intense and peculiar fascination. And the same "fleshly wisdom" comes into the church today and behaves in precisely the same manner. It thinks more of graces than of grace. It esteems ritual more than lowly penitence. It craves fine music more than holy worship. It is more outraged by a musical defect than by a moral fault. It emphasizes form more than substance, the law more than the spirit and the transient more than the eternal.

I noticed that when the king of England was paying a certain visit last year the newspapers said that in one room the decorations were so abundant that there was but little room left for his majesty. The ritual crowded out the king. Well, all this is "fleshly wisdom," the emphasis of the lower side and the neglect of the higher, the obtruding of human nature instead of fellowship and communion with God. And all that is, therefore, fiercely and persistently hostile to noble and exalted Christian behavior.

But the apostle gives us some positive characteristics of noble Christian intercourse. First of all, it must be "in simplicity." It is very significant that the apostle begins his positive portrayal here. What is the meaning of the word? And what is the nature of the disposition? Simplicity is the opposite of complexity. Little children sometimes send parcels one to another, containing things wrapped up in endless coverings. These multiplied wrappings suggest complication; if the innermost thing could be shown at once we would have a symbol of simplicity.

There are men and women whose characters are hidden in endless coverings and complexities. We never know what is beneath. We describe them in phrases like these—"a dark horse"; "always something up his sleeve"; "never know what you are dealing with"; "never know what he is after"; "underhanded"; "moved by ulterior motives." That is a complex character. It is not simple. A man is to be one thing, not two, or three, or four. He is to be open and aboveboard, able to be got at and understood. "If thine eye be single!" That is the Master's statement of the great attribute. Christian behavior is to be, in the first place, characterized by the grace of openness, frankness, candor, singleness, simplicity. What we seem to be we are to be. Our skin is to be the index of our state.

Examined Under the Light of Life

And now the apostle gives the second characteristic of noble behavior; "in godly sincerity." That is a very brilliant and picturesque word. It literally means sun-examined; life subjected and tried by the most searching test. When we examine a thing everything depends upon the light in which the examination is made. It is one thing to examine a theatrical stage by limelight, but if we could take the most brilliant stage scene out of the limelight into the blazing sunlight of the noon we should be surprised at our discoveries. Paint and powder and stucco and artifice would glare upon us. And if I examine myself in the light of a worldly expediency I may pass muster with comparative ease, but if I examine myself by some supernatural beam from the Light of Life there would be a great exposure.

So far we have seen that Christian behavior is to be characterized by the absence of "fleshly wisdom," and is to be beautifully simple and sunnily sincere. The apostle mentions a third thing; it is to be "in the grace of God." There I think he takes us away to the very heart of the behavior. He leads us away from the attractive effects to the common cause. It is as though he said, "We have looked at two beautiful fruits—simplicity and sincerity. Now let me show you their root. If we want our behavior to be strongly gracious we must find its resources in grace. Grace grows out of grace. The grace of simplicity and the grace of sincerity find their life and nourishment in the grace of God.

Can we obtain this grace? I recently saw a very pathetic sentence in the report of one of our great hospitals: "We cannot get radium enough. We have an infinitesimal quantity, but not nearly enough for our patients." Not enough radium for healing! But what about this infinitely more precious radium of grace, which changes human infirmities into nobilities and moral repulsions into strength and beauty? Can we get enough? "Where sin abounded grace doth much more abound." How can we get it? "He giveth grace unto the humble." The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ is given to all who seek it in penitence and humility. The noble and gracious life is abundantly possible in Christ our Lord.

Congregationalists Reaffirm Faith

The new Congregational creed adopted at Kansas City does not attempt any metaphysical definition of the Trinity, but none the less for that, it is trinitarian all the way through. Its first sentence reads: "We believe in God the Father, infinite in wisdom, goodness and love; and in Jesus Christ, his Son, our Lord and Saviour, who for our salvation lived and died and rose again and liveth evermore; and in the Holy Spirit, who taketh of the things of Christ and revealeth them to us, renewing, comforting and inspiring the souls of men." This language is not Nicene or Athanasian, but it is scriptural, and that is vastly better. Moreover, there is another strong trinitarian touch in the last sentence, which is introduced by the clause, "Depending, as did our fathers, upon the continued guidance of the Holy Spirit to lead us into all the truth." This surely means very much more than "a mere influence." If there is any unitarian drift in the Congregational fellowship, the Kansas City gathering failed to show it.

BY DAN CRAWFORD

In Apostolic Succession to Philip

The unique and scintillating style of expression which has made famous the remarkable Scotch missionary to Africa—"successor to Livingstone"—now visiting the United States, is clearly manifest in both his speech and his writings. Apparently Dan Crawford sees and hears nothing as other men see and hear. Experiences and actions commonplace to others become, when described by him, imbued with a thrill which makes the blood leap. The Continent is proud of the privilege of presenting from Mr. Crawford's pen this very characteristic rehearsal of certain of his experiences in Africa.

YOU HAVE PROBABLY never noted that the first case of individual conversion in the Acts of the Apostles is that of a black man. I think (and don't you?) that this is a great and gracious point for the central African missionary. Would you care to conjecture with me the reason why—I mean why the black is first in the Acts? Well, I think the obvious and only answer is that it is because he was last. But why, when and where "last"? you ask. Listen.

You remember that when our Lord Jesus Christ was staggering along the Via Dolorosa under his cruel cross (oh, shades of Lincoln!) they grabbed a black man, one Simon of Cyrene, that he might bear the cross after Jesus. The Eastern church canonized him as St. Simon, the Black One, for his was the high and holy honor of bearing for the weary Christ his cross of shame and pain. Our Lord Jesus Christ was not very long in the black man's debt (he never is); and three hours afterwards he paid it back in kind not cash. In kind not cash, I say, for did he not bear for the African all his weary burdens on the very cross that the African had borne for him? Alas! the dear old darky has been carrying loads ever since that dark and drear Golgotha day. But he made a great good start then.

A Task for a Man Where an Angel Is Impotent

And now let me drag you into this Bible-for-the-blacks business. Hearken to these words from the Acts of the Apostles: "And the angel of the Lord spake unto Philip saying, Arise, go down towards the south, unto the way that leadeth to the black man's land." Moral: Do not call your friend an angel, for don't you see the pathos, the tragedy, of what an angel cannot do? Wonder of wonders, here is an angel forced to come to a bit of blood-bought dust and say, "Philip, you do the job. I'm only an angel; I can't." Yes, I say, there is sardonic sarcasm here, for "angel" in Greek means messenger. Here is an angel who cannot "deliver the goods." Saith he, "My job is messenger, but I cannot carry the message." Oh! yes, there is a thrill in the thought that the angel of the Lord was forced to say to a bit of blood-bought dust, "Go you down to the black man's land and give him the gospel; I (angel-messenger!)—I cannot!"

The other day in Central Africa after having done my fifteen mile tramp I got to the end very jaded and dumped myself in the bush on what we call our forest deck chair, be it known, an old tree felled in the grass fire. I did not see anything—you never do see anything in the grass—so imagine my surprise when out of nowhere a native at my left elbow growled, "You are angry." "Oh," said I, dissolving in smiles, "you seem to know, tell me all about it!" Those smiles rather nonplused him, and he extenuated thus: "Well," said he, "in our tribe we all say that a silent man is an angry man." Sniffing philosophy I said to myself, "Oh, here is a philosopher," and turned round to draw the enemy's fire a bit. "What do you mean?" I quizzed. (Oh, dear frends, he is metaphorically going to stab my soul.) "That is the reason," he retorted, "why we know God is angry." "Why?" "God is silent."

I saw it all, saw the piercing pathos of the centuries—God is angry for he is silent! "Oh," moaned I, "what a wireless call reaching across America!" That should set America on fire. I whipped out my revolver (my little pocket Bible, I mean) and rousingly and royally I read Hebrews 1:1—"God, who at sundry times and in divers manners spake in time past unto the fathers by the prophets, hath in these last days spoken unto us by his Son." I thought I had whipped my enemy, horse, foot and dragoons; but the African is not easily beaten and here he is coming for me with the light of metaphorical battle in his eyes. Don't you see what he is going to do; can't you guess he is going to knock me down with the butt of my own revolver? I mean the fearful phrase "these last days." With awful artifice he takes hold of my text at the opposite end and begins to toy with me (if I may muddle metaphors) as a cat plays with a mouse.

With a purring politeness he ruthlessly rubs it in: "In these last days." (Don't you see what is coming? Hasn't it got a sort of "last Wednesday" look about it?) Then he said ingratiatingly, "Last week, sir, you mean?" Nonplused, I began to temporize, to trim, and to hedge, for I did not want to give smug, serious America away. Oh, there is such a thing as being smugly religious and some of you are so spiritually fat you can scarcely waddle! There is tragedy at conferences in gorging ourselves with spiritual food. So I had to face my man and give you all away. Yes, brutally and blatantly I had to tell tragically of the long neglect of centuries since the Lord Jesus Christ commissioned his church, saying, "Go ye into all the world." And I told him these days were denominated "the times of the Gentiles" (two plurals, please!) and all, —yes, all-the-colors-of-the-rainbow Gentiles—are going to have their day.

Witness for God in Africa's Untouched Wild

I have been asked, "How do you find those natives in the wilds, far off the lonely frontiers of the world? In what state of mind do you find them towards God when you get into a spot where never mortal white man with his creaking boots got?" Now, the farther you penetrate into the wilds of the interior, the more is one delightful, delicious fact borne in upon you concerning these uttermost men in the uttermost parts of the earth. I mean that they believe astoundingly in the fact of one God. They never would descend or condescend with a New Yorker to argue the being of God. Have you caught my point? I mean that with them this is the awful axiom, the preliminary postulate of life. They would not—nay, they could not and should not—even argue it. "How do I know there is a God?" they say. "How do I know that my goats passed along the wet road in the night? How, indeed, if not by their deep imprints in the mud? We all see the sun. Yes, and the sun sees us!"

I heard a young missionary giving his trial (and trying!) African sermon, a potential Spurgeon taking his preliminary flutter in homiletics. And he began the tedious, time-wasting process of "taking coals to Newcastle," as we say in England—"taking steel to Pittsburg" I suppose is your American equivalent metaphor for talking platitudes. Laboring at the obvious for half an hour, looking down from the austere heights of his white skin, smugly he said, "Look at the mountains, wonderful mountains; therefore there is a God. Look at the streams, flowing and glistening streams; ergo there is a God." And so and on until the dear old African chief most impolitely and impatiently yawned, saying, "When is he going to begin? Why, he has given us a lost half hour on what all the world knows, the nonarguable. Who dare deny," said he, "the doctrine of no rain no mushrooms, no God no anything?" In America we talk about the law of cause and effect, but an African prefers the concrete to the abstract. He never talks about vague cause and effect, for fine words don't butter any parsnips. He talks about "no rain no mushrooms."

I say that it is glorious that yonder far away on the lonely frontiers of the world we do not have to argue the point whether there is a God. They would never deign to stoop to argue it. And that, I say, is the glorious genius of the Bible. Fancy Genesis 1:1 leading off apologetically by laboring whether or not in the beginning there was a God! Nay, verily, it strikes off in that glorious take-it-or-leave-it fashion. "In the beginning God" did so and so. God is pregnantly presumed. And such is the jubilant dogma of Africa! When I went in there and at first felt so lonely, the devil defied me to preach the good old D. L. Moody gospel in the wilds of Africa. Then, fancy the flood of feeling that comes when you exultingly find that instead of being on the sinking sands of question or conjecture for your fighting fundamentals, you are on blessed bed-rock. If we had to carry the Rock of Ages on our back into Africa we would never and never get there. It carries us, we don't carry it! "That Rock followed them."

The King of Kings Recognized Among Cannibals

Let me prove this by describing one memorable meeting I held in Kalamata's town among the cannibals, a meeting held on the day subsequent to my seeing a man eating human flesh. You wonder how these hell-hounds can conceivably understand the gospel; especially if the fugitive preacher has to push on past their place a few miles before his camp for the oncoming night is reached. Well, here is a typical meeting on virgin soil, and you, my hearers, shall judge whether Paul spake not the truth when he wrote that "God hath not left himself without witness." The deep-voiced sycamore drum calls them in, an ugly, verminating throng almost in puris naturalibus. There behold! the uttermost man in the uttermost parts of the earth. (Yonder, too, on the throne of God, do not forget the Christ who can save to the uttermost.) Supporting me on my near right is the chief, as chairman, with whom I propose a loud Socratic dialogue, not as preacher, but merely inquirer, with notebook respectfully open. No skimming, skirting, and shirking of difficulties here. Shades of Socrates! I simply ask and he simply answers. Why not? "A big horse takes a big fence," and this big bouncing black is on for big bouncing business. Note, please, also, that I have given—on the strength of Paul's quoted words—the bold initial guaranty that I will neither intrude nor innovate one newfangled idea in the meeting! The theme for the day is "God," and having got a thousand voices to hush the ineffable name three times, we settle down to this Bible business.

Well, to anticipate, it turns out that the subject of our choice is a gold mine. Not only about God is it, but from God, too. Asked their name for him, the answer comes sharp and short from the chairman-chief, "Vidie Mukulu," i. e., the great King. And here comes the opening in question No. 2. "You, the king of these parts, tell me, please, what your kingship involves." Answer—a long string of kingship paraphernalia: A king has laws, a judgment seat, subjects, rewards and punishments. And now comes the missionary's opening, for had not a thousand voices declared that God was the great King (Vidie Mukulu)? Sharp and sudden you flash in upon them the question, "And so God has all these kingship rights, too?" Now's the momentous moment for the appearance of the Holy Bible. "A king has laws, has he? Well, here they are, the great King's. "A king crushes rebellion, does he?" And so on and on you go, rigorously innovating nothing, but merely building on their own adjective "great" governing their own noun "king"—God demonstrated a great King preaching great peace by the great Lord Jesus Christ to his subjects in revolt.

All this, too, far, far in central Africa beyond the reach of any mission by whatsoever name named. How vivid many a Pauline statement becomes! Run down the Acts, for example, and note those apostolic speeches. To a congregation with vellum copies of "Prophets and Psalms" these were profusely and piously quoted. But when Paul took his plucky plunge into gentiledom he even preached and practiced God nigh at hand, God touching their gentile lives at every point; yea, in God they lived and moved and had their being. Quite a different thing, this, remember, from the folly of pretending to preach to the God in a man. How can God be in some souls when Paul says, "At that time ye were without God"? The only god in a negro is the god of this world, the devil.

Immortality an Unquestioned Faith with Savages

And from God let us turn to a second great and gracious gain. Here again we strike blessed bedrock, for flaming like a fire in the blackness of darkness we see the divine doctrine of immortality. For no African would ever descend or condescend to argue the immortality of the soul. This is another awful axiom of the take-it-or-leave-it brand. They sublimely say, "The dead do not really die." They sacredly say, "The body is the cottage of the soul." They do not say, a la America, that Mr. Jones or Mr. Smith has departed this life, for that is a platitude. Yes, and a poor enough one, for nature nastily tells that sad story soon enough. Nay, they beat us who platitudinize, for they splendidly say, "He has arrived!" And all this away where never white man was, missionary or merchant.

So here again the old obstinate idea is proved that immortality is not a mere doctrine but an instinct, a much—oh, yes, a much—more serious thing. Grotesque and diversified in its million manifestations (granted!), but a notorious instinct, and as such surer than the instinct of the bird of passage never deceived in its migrations. Sure as the bee when it elaborates the cell for the future honey. Sure, yes, surer far than that instinct of the butterfly and beetle when they prepare the cradle and the food for the offspring they will never see. Even Darwin was forced to own the vast ramifications of this instinct of immortality among degraded races of men, but curiously argued (fie, Mr. Darwin!) that "if the human mind was developed from the lowest forms of creatures, then how could that mind—human though it was—be trusted in its instincts?" Of course the bewildering part of all this is that the speaker is the self-same Darwin who sees elsewhere and anywhere instinct as a mighty molding law ruling the creation like clockwork, and unerringly causing the swallow, for instance, to shoot south overseas for the sure sunshine and the flowers. Not by whim or caprice, but by law—the law of instinct—does that swallow dart south to the sun it never saw but is going to see. Then, Mr. Darwin, why, oh, why, deny to the mighty soul what you grant to the small swallow? Are ye not of more value than many swallows? Moral: The thirst for the Infinite proves the Infinite. "Sir, I hold," said Emerson—and well spake he—"I hold that God who keeps his word with the birds and fishes in all their migratory instincts will keep his word with man."

Somebody sent me a question as to the natives' conception of the cruel death of Christ. Let me tell you a wonderfully pathetic thing in this connection. Tramping around I went in to preach before some wild ones. One of them was named Malemba, a splendid man and an ex-cannibal. I am writing a book about it and really I must subtitle it "Malemba's Book," such brainy witticisms and criticisms he utters! Flowing like a tide I addressed these men on the only subject that is worth talking about—to wit, the death of Christ and how that God's Christ died for our sins according to the Scriptures. The Song began to sing in my soul as I preached, and yet I trust a sob stole into my voice and my eyes glistened a bit.

And then, what then? Then comes a curious custom, for after you finish the audience puts up a man to hit back—a custom which would be a good enough innovation over here! The pulpit has been hitting the pew, but now they are going to hit back. So they put up their best man Malemba and he began with, "Sir," very politely. "Sir," he said, "I am afraid that I have mistaken you, and I do not want to respond until I verify that I am right; please repeat it." So I repeated it. "I am asked," he said finally, "to reply for the town in connection with the death of Christ at Calvary, and now, oh, now, we know that you white people are really the worst brand of humans that ever trod the planet. I could not believe it until I had heard it twice told. For you have dared unblushingly to tell us that you went away and killed the very Best One who ever trod this earth. And astoundingly not content with that (and not ashamed of it!) you have crossed the sea 2,000 miles to tell us that you did it!"

Figure how my heart contracted with a wild spasm. But they are all waiting and I have to give my come-to-the-point answer, which is very meek and mild. "You asked me," said I, "to repeat the story twice, and yet you grabbed it at one end only. Why blink my main point? Why dodge the best bit of all, that he, the murdered one, freely and fully forgave us, his murderers, and out of sheer sunshiny joy I have crossed sea and land, mountain and flood to tell you that he has forgiven and will forgive even you." And then I drove the attack home, for—oh, yes, they are in this bad business. Told them they also were his mad murderers—yes, even they. "Yesterday," said I, "in your camp—you know it!—you were all at the bad old blacksmith trade of making new nails to nail him to the tree. Yes, you were making a needlessly new spear to stab his bleeding side. Every sin you sin, why, of course, with that sin you crucify the Son of God afresh and put him to an open shame!" We had a great, a gracious time.

That, I say, is the first hint I give you of the big, brainy type of native who must be met. No trimming, no hedging, no temporizing—you must meet him. Alas! often Mr. White Man's remarks are more pointed than to the point.

Golgotha Seen as a Victorious Battlefield

Now come to their conception of the cross. A most wonderful phrase has been coined by the African church in connection with the death of Christ. I thought incredulously it was a mere passing phrase of a passing phase. But not at all; "the victory of Golgotha" until the crack of doom is a negro copyright. Here, thought I, is another insolent paradox. How can the death of the Son of God, who died the abject death of a felon on the tree, how, oh, how can it be, to this mob of might-is-right people, the victory of Golgotha?" (Note this: They have not taken up the word "Calvary," but all across the marsh they say "Golgotha." There is a moaning in it; that word connotes to them all the dying pangs of the Son of God. So they splendidly speak of the victory of Golgotha!) Fishing for more facts, I asked a native the other day to explain to me the why of this veritable victory of Golgotha.

"Don't you understand what you are preaching?" asked he. Now be it remembered, one of the most delightful things is for us missionaries to become the converts of our converts. You feel the easy enjoyment of one who is sitting under the shade of a tree he has planted. He said, "You do not seem to understand what you preach; what you have really been preaching all these years, is

Back in the romantic days when Richmond was at its best before the civil war, when poets and writers in America were comparatively few, Marion Harland, then a young schoolgirl, had a never-to-be-forgotten sight of Edgar Allan Poe. His writings had already enthralled her fancy, and his personality seemed both strong and charming. Here is a pretty little piece of reminiscence about one of the most interesting figures in American literature.

MY ONE GLIMPSE OF EDGAR ALLAN POE

By MARION HARLAND

IN THE "all-so-long-ago" of ante-bellum Richmond life what might be called the canonical hours for fashionable calls were from 12 m. to 3 o'clock p. m.

Hence when on one July day I returned from taking a music lesson and heard through the drawing-room door the murmur of voices in social conversation, I laid my portfolio on the hall table instead of in its usual place upon the piano in the back parlor. In putting it down my eye fell upon a solitary card lying on a silver tray. I picked it up, mildly and idly curious. It bore in neat old English script:

EDGAR ALLAN POE

I learned later that he had called with a note of introduction to my mother from a Boston friend. In the thrill of the moment it did not occur to me to speculate as to the manner of his coming.

She would have been an exceptional schoolgirl who could in the circumstances resist the temptation to lay her ear against the panels of the closed door and hearken breathlessly for sounds from within I was far from being an exception to my mates in many respects. But not one of them had such an ample excuse for the breach of good manners that was mine that hour. Other girls had read Poe cursorily. We had discussed "Tales of the Grotesque and Arabesque" as curiosities of literature in the young ladies' seminary from which I had been lately graduated. Our professor of English literature had dissected "The Raven" in class and we had shuddered in midnight readings over "The Fall of the House of Usher." Every mother's daughter of us had heard outlined tales of the university scrapes of the adopted son and partial namesake of the rich Scotchman whose fine old house on Fifth and Main streets was known familiarly as "Mr. Scotch Allan's." Rumor had it that the wild boy's exclusion from the house and heart of his patron was less on account of his various escapades in college and army than because he had resented the installation of a second wife into the place vacated by the death of his earliest and beloved benefactress.

It was a time-worn tale by now, but the rising fame of the discarded protege had revived it lately in the public mind. I had drunk in thirstily the details from the lips of elderly women who recalled the pitiful tale of the death of the young actress, the mother of three infant children.

Childhood Home of Marion Harland in Richmond

Crouching behind the balcony railing she watched the poet Poe

One of the ministers of mercy to the stricken family still treasured in her "reliquary" a sallowed copy of a card distributed on the morning of the day advertised as the date of the benefit to be given for the relief of the family of the dying woman, "with the advice and at the solicitation of many most respectable families":

"To the Humane—On this night, Mrs. Poe, lingering on the bed of disease, and surrounded by her children, asks your assistance and asks it perhaps for the last time."

She outlived the appeal but a week. Her eldest child was received into the family of a Baltimore friend of the father. Edgar was adopted by Mr. Allan, at his baptism receiving the godfather's name. Baby Rosalie was taken by Mrs. Mackenzie, a close intimate of the first Mrs. Allan, and reared as a daughter of the home.

Edgar Allan Poe

From a daguerreotype—said by Rosalie Poe to be the best picture of her brother ever made

Within a year my heart had bled at the news of the death of the poet's girl wife. I had not needed the affecting details of his life to enlist my sympathies and to kindle admiration. Not a line written by him that came to my sight went unread. I had committed "The Bells" to an affectionate and faithful memory and delighted in saying it over to myself when alone. For the life of me, I could not have told why I thus dreamed and reveled. I knew the power of the magician without seeking to analyze it.

I repeat that I found this a full justification for the ill-bred eavesdropping upon the threshold of the blank door and for straining my senses with passionate intensity for the sound of the voice of my mother's visitor. The door was thick and I got not one word. I heard the stranger's voice—a rich barytone with singularly musical inflections. His speech was low and somewhat monotonous to my young ears. Perhaps I had expected elocutionary effects from the man who could "think out" the rhythmic marvels of "The Bells."

As my mother spoke in reply, I sped upstairs, impelled by a new thought. I might not catch pearls and diamonds of speech. I could and would see him out of the house.

I passed the dwelling when on a visit to Richmond last spring and paused to look at the balcony topping the old-fashioned porch. A door from within opened down to the floor. I knelt within the roomy balcony, close to the balustrade, directly over the front steps.

The embowered street was very still. The tree shadows—thick with summer foliage—were asleep in the white noon upon the pavement. The glory of mid-July was in the cloudless sky and abroad upon the dreaming earth. The smell of the roses which were my mother's pride and joy floated up to me while I waited. In the eloquent hush of nature the murmur of the river rose and fell upon the ear—the song that is never stilled by night or by day.

Was it that that set my pulses moving to the minuet measure of what I whispered in the waiting reverie?

"And all with pearl and ruby glowing
Was the fair palace door,
Through which came flowing,
flowing, flowing,
And sparkling evermore,
A troop of echoes whose sweet duty
Was but to sing
In voices of surpassing beauty
The wit and wisdom of the King."

It was a way I had—repeating, half-aloud, rhymes that had enchained my fancy. The melody of the words captured and held the imagination more than the image they presented.

Hiding and Waiting to See a Real Live Poet

I had never seen a poet. It was a beautiful—a solemn thing—that my first sight of one of the "shining ones" should be Edgar Allan Poe.

I may have knelt and dreamed and whispered rhymes to myself for a half hour when the lower door opened and there were steps upon the porch floor. I leaned further forward, still screened from chance glaces from below by the heavy balustrade.

He walked lightly down the steps and passed through the gate at the foot of the short flight. Outside of the gate he halted, his hand still upon it, and looked up and down the street as if hesitating in which direction he should go. Standing thus, he lifted his hat to let the air pass through his hair and stood for an instant, gazing over the palings at the thicket of roses blooming within. He did not look up once, yet I saw his face distinctly. It is as clearly limned upon my mind today as it was then. So clearly, that I pronounce intelligently upon the comparative likeness of his many portraits to the original. None that I have ever seen conveys a just idea of the pure, indefinable refinement and clarity of feature and expression. He was evidently in a serene mood. The perfect day; the reaches of green shade under the vista of fine trees; the perfumed air and the river song may have had a message for him that no other could interpret.

Marion Harland, the School-girl Who Worshiped Poe

In that one instant I inventoried every particular of face and form. He wore a summer suit of light, black cloth and his hat was a black leghorn. I recalled at once that his wife had not been dead very long and decided that he still wore mourning for her. He carried a lithe figure with military erectness; I remarked especially that his ungloved hands were slender and shapely. "Patrician!" I said then, and "Just what a poet's should be!" The thought ran through me like some subtle electric fluid that the hand holding the hat had written "The Raven" and "The Bells"! His mouth was shadowed by a slight dark mustache; his hair was black and curled lightly.

It was all over in less time than it takes me to write the last sentence. With one last look at the rose thickets he put his hat upon his head and moved slowly down the street, not glancing back as I arose and strained my eyes for a last glimpse of him until he was lost in the distance.

He bore no resemblance to one who had written of himself as the doomed wretch whom—

> "Disaster followed fast, and followed faster
> Till the dirges of his hopes that melancholy burden bore
> Of 'Never—nevermore.'"

Yet the lines were on my lips in shaking off the dream.

The reading world and the purveyors of pessimistic gossip are conversant with the events of the two years separating the death of Virginia Clemm Poe from the mysterious tragedy of her lover-husband's passing away from earth. Readers of his biography will recall the heroic devotion of the aunt who was also his mother-in-law.

N. P. Willis wrote of her in announcing in The Home Journal the death of Poe:

"Her daughter died a year and a half ago, but Mrs. Clemm did not desert him. She continued his ministering angel—living with him, caring for him; guarding him against exposure and, when he was carried away by temptation and self-abandonment, prostrated by destitution, true to him still. If woman's devotion, born with a first love and fed with human passion, hallow its object, what does not a devotion like this—pure, disinterested and holy as the watch of an invisible spirit—say for him who inspired it?"

More than twenty years after my one and only glimpse of her son-in-law, I was surprised by the receipt of a letter from Mrs. Clemm. She was poor and old and ill. "Since the death of my darling Eddy there has been nobody to care whether I live or die," she said.

Unable longer to support herself by reason of ill health and the weight of years, she applied to certain American authors for aid in securing her a place in a home for aged women. A penciled note, gracefully worded, written from a sick bed, thanked me for the response to her appeal.

I heard nothing more of her until I read in a Baltimore paper the notice of "the decease on February 16, 1871, in the Church Home in Baltimore of Mrs. Maria Clemm, the mother-in-law and the aunt of Edgar Allan Poe, in her eightieth year."

No element of squalor and of tragedy was wanting in the record of his earthly career.

That he is now reckoned among the immortals, whose fame the grateful generation following his will not let die, does not lessen the heartache that throbs at the mention of his name.

For myself I shall ever be thankful that I carry in a safe chamber of memory the picture of the spirituelle face and gallant bearing of the hero-poet of my girlish homage as I saw him in the setting of the embowered street of the Virginia city, under the blue of summer skies, when the roses were in richest bloom and the lullaby of the river was as the gentle flow of "the waters of quietness."

Ozone Theory a Delusion?

Much has been written and said about the marvelous effects of ozone. All the benefits of life on the mountains, in the forests and on the sea have been credited to the "ozone in the air." Various chemical devices have been manufactured and offered to the public to "make the air of the bedchamber or the sick room exactly like that of the pine woods." Now it is declared these theories are delusive. Professors Jordan and Carlson of the University of Chicago have carried on an extensive series of observations and experiments to determine the exact effect and value of ozone. The results of their work appear in a recent issue of The Journal of the American Medical Association. The conclusion reached is that the hygienic value of ozone would be hardly worth considering were it not for the persistent claims made by the manufacturers and promoters of ozone generators. So far as the destruction of germs is concerned, these claims have little or no foundation. Experiments carried on show that human beings are injuriously affected by an amount of ozone far less than is necessary to kill the germs. There is no evidence for supposing that the quantity of ozone that can be tolerated by a human being has the slightest germicidal action. Ozone does not make "pure air" any more than strong spices make pure food.

These experiments of the Chicago scientists are further confirmed by experiments carried on by the hygienic laboratory of the California state board of health, the results of which appear in the same publication. These conclusions of scientific men simply confirm the experience and observations of past generations. There is no air so good as outdoor air, and the best way to get it is to open a door or window. Modern mechanical devices for "purifying the air" are in the main delusions and snares.

Mark Twain and "Dear Old Joe"

An Incident in the Life of Samuel L. Clemens as Told by His Friend Rev. Joseph H. Twichell of Hartford

BY ROBERT HUGH MORRIS

Mr. Twichell (at left) and Rev. H. C. McBride

"THEY TELL ME you are great admirers of the writings of my old friend and parishioner, Sam Clemens." Rev. Joseph Twichell, sometimes called "the grand old man of the Congregational Church," thus began the conversation with his visitors, two Presbyterian preachers who were making a pilgrimage to his beautiful home in beautiful Hartford.

We admitted a partiality for "Tom Sawyer" and the "Connecticut Yankee," to say nothing of some other personages created by the one and only Mark Twain. We also ventured an opinion, supposed to be literary, to the effect that "The Innocents Abroad" was a great success because it was the very first book of travel which told the truth; that all other such books before its time had told of the art, cathedrals, cities, people of Europe and the Holy Land, not as they were, but as the authors supposed the reader would want to be told they were; while "The Innocents" laughed at the fakes, wept hypocritical tears at the tomb of Adam, openly flouted the most pious legends if they were manifestly frauds and plainly admitted the author was not wild over the "old masters."

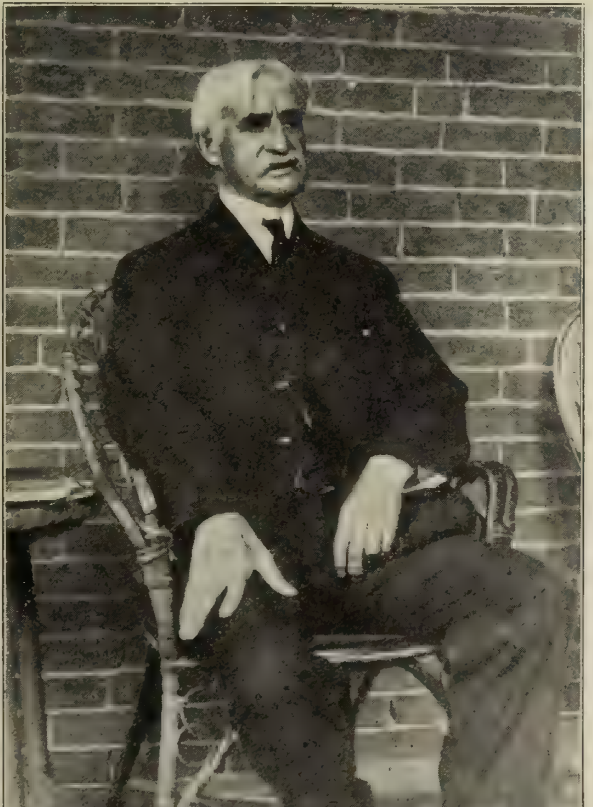
Mr. Twichell thought this literary criticism—not altogether original—was perhaps just; but it was evident that he was more interested in Sam Clemens than in Mark Twain—in the man than in the author.

"Yes, yes," he said reflectively, sadly; then, "Ah, me! Well, well, well!" He seemed to be reviving memories that were very sad, though sweet. He walked about the room, saying "Well, well!" for a minute or two. Then—

"Wait a moment!" he exclaimed, literally running out of the room and up the stairs. (Mr. Twichell is only 75 and cannot be expected to act like a man who is really old.)

"There," he said, as, returning, he piled the small table in front of us with letters, penned by the friend of whom we had been speaking. We glanced through them and as we looked we reflected that they were priceless and that in future generations some of these very manuscripts may be sold by a bartering literary world for small fortunes—if they are not destroyed by friends who wish to forestall any such sacrilege of friendship. Certainly Mr. Twitchell himself will never permit them to be bartered. The letters were written on all sorts and sizes of paper, and from all parts of the world. Usually they began "Dear Joe," and in the later ones "Dear Old Joe." Many of them breathed an inexpressible sadness.

One epistle, though pathetic, was laugh-provoking. The writer was, or professed to be, in a bad humor. He wanted to quarrel with someone. He had no one conveniently at hand who would submit to being the object of objurgation. He would write to Howells and give him a tongue—or pen—thrashing, but Howells was old and "wouldn't stand for it." He therefore fell back on his old friend Joe, who was a veritable Godsend when it came to the matter of receiving the output of a friend's ill humor.



Rev. Joseph Twichell

While we examined the letters Mr. Twichell told us quaint stories of the famous author. Here is one of them:

"It was at Baden Baden. I forget how long ago. But we were young men in those days. We were taking a walk through the crowded streets, Clemens edging his way along and I following him.

"As we made our way across a small square we were confronted by a soldierly-looking person, erect and dignified, uniformed and gold-braided.

"'Am I addressing Mr. Samuel Clemens, the American author?'

"I replied that my companion was Mr. Clemens, somewhat surprised that anyone so far from home should know my friend as 'Clemens,' rather than as 'Mark Twain.' The officer gave a military salute and said, 'His royal highness the prince of Wales, who is visiting Baden Baden, has seen and recognized Mr. Clemens. He presents his compliments and asks that you do him the favor of speaking with him.'

"Clemens signified his willingness to go at once, and the officer led the way. We were presented, with due regard to ceremony, even there in the street, to the future king of Great Britain.

"The prince was a handsome, courteous man with a most cultured voice. He was most dignified and soldierly in his bearing. He and Clemens were soon conversing freely, walking side by side, while the attendants of the prince and Sam's friend followed. I should judge the prince was a man who never permitted any kind of familiarity; he was born to the purple and he knew how to wear it; he was a princely prince, but more than once his royal highness shook with dignified laughter.

"It was a sight," continued Mr. Twichell, laughing reminiscently, "to see those two men walking together."

Here "Sam's friend" got up to show his callers how the two men walked.

"The prince of Wales," he said, "was dignity personified. He walked as though he owned the earth and didn't care who knew it."

Here Mr. Twichell marched across the room, head erect, chest expanded, steps measured and stately. We could plainly see the future King Edward VII. walking through the streets of the famous Old World city, the unconsciously observed of all observers.

"And Sam Clemens—you know, Sam had a little of the free and easy swing of the early Southwest, the swagger of the plains; had it in fact down to the day of his death; he was a kind of rough diamond in some ways — went shambling along, bobbing around like a sailor fresh from a long voyage."

Mr. Twichell walked the length of the room in imitation of "Sam." He rolled his body, he rolled his head; his arms were like the proverbial windmill; he gave us nods and becks and wreathed smiles. The realistic imitation was very entertaining, very laughable. It was also fascinating, for we reflected that here was one of the most honored ministers of his denomination—of any denomination—impersonating for us two of the most different but two of the most illustrious men of their century; two princes of two different lands, who, whatever the differences of birth and training, were princely in all they did and all they were, each in his own peculiar way.

"You are not going already!" Mr. Twichell was sincerely surprised and as sincerely grieved. His is a sociable disposition.

"Stay and let's talk about some other men—or more about Clemens, if you prefer. It is so good to have younger men come to see me. I sometimes think I have outlived my friends. Well," he continued when we had regretfully explained that the train would not wait for us and that we must be in Middleton at 6, "if you must go now, do come again; come often."

He followed us out to the veranda, where he sat by a little table and jested of his lack of pulchritude as we pointed our cameras at him. Then he walked with us out to the street, willingly submitting to further insolence from the camera, and then hailed a street car and put us on board. He shook hands warmly and again made us promise to come again. The conductor of the car must have known the grand old man, for he kept the car waiting a full minute while our host gave us parting injunctions. Moreover, no one on the car seemed to be in a hurry. Perhaps everyone knew Mr. Twichell and was glad to hear a word from him.

Or, it may be they were simply too polite to even cast a reproachful look at the conductor, for the New Englanders are a most courteous and polite people.

THE WAYFARER

Going to Church in New York

NOT ALL THE SIGHTS of New York may be seen from what is colloquially called the "rubberneck wagon," or sight-seeing automobile. Things best worth seeing anywhere, either in Mandalay or Manhattan, are not pointed out by professional guides. More significant than the city's skyscrapers, and more profitable than the Bowery, is a Sunday morning congregation in the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian church when Dr. Jowett is in the pulpit.

The hunger-cry of the soul drives folks to where spiritual good may be found.

From every continent and from every state in the union visitors throng week by week to this church; the congregation is doubtless more cosmopolitan than any gathering on the polygot East Side. The universal desire for comfort, for inspiration, for a clear ministry of the eternal Word expresses itself here. Dr. Jowett is famous as a preacher of the gospel. He's not a brilliant performer; but the word has gone abroad that here is a man who speaks to the hungry hearts of men. He will not itinerate as a convention speaker nor as a visiting preacher; so the world has made a path to his pulpit, even as Emerson said.

The marvel of that spectacle, unmatched by anything the Wayfarer has ever seen in St. Paul's and Westminster abbey in London, in St. Peter's in Rome, or in St. Stephen's in Vienna, may not be passed lightly over. The morning of the Wayfarer's visit was rainy, yet the auditorium of Fifth Avenue church, which seats 2,500 persons, was full. Commonly visitors are turned away, sometimes to the number of a thousand in a morning. That fact is revealing concerning human nature. These strangers are not curiosity seekers, they have not been allured by sensational sermon topics or by promise of spectacular oratorical performances. They are men and women hungry for spiritual edification. They know that this quiet man will have a word for their spirits. And they are not disappointed.

As he looked over that great congregation, catching sight here and there of familiar faces from other cities, the Wayfarer noted the dominant New Yorkishness of it all. While the apparently poor were not lacking, yet as a whole the people were modishly dressed. Prosperity and alertness were written large upon them. If the country which rails at New York were to be given a glimpse of this questing, worshiping company, it might speak less positively of the materialism and selfishness of the great city. We talk often of the nobler personality hidden beneath the raiment of toil and poverty; may we not have a word for the men and women in broadcloth, who are, first of all, seekers after God? A morning with Dr. Jowett's congregation conduces to charity.

The quiet churchliness of the great auditorium itself and its lack of overornamentation and display impress the stranger. This room was made for hearing in, and not for looking at. None of the windows have stained glass scenes; they are the quiet, brown geometrical designs common half a century ago. This all seems the very setting for Dr. Jowett's preaching.

* * * * * * *

The man himself is slight of frame, growing gray and bald. He preaches in an academic gown and his mannerisms are few. His voice is so low that one wonders if the worshipers in the rear can hear him. Yet its soft and soothing tones penetrate everywhere. The very first time the preacher opens his lips—and it is in prayer—the restfulness of his tone touches the tired spirit. Slowly, reverently, with a perceptible pause after every phrase, the Lord's prayer is repeated, and it is prayed.

That same note of present reality, of vital worshipfulness, is in the reading of the Scriptures. Quite as he would read aloud across the breakfast table to his wife the latest important bit of news from the daily paper, so Dr. Jowett reads this portion of the Bible—as a matter of importance in which every listener has an interest; and as calling for an occasional interjected comment by the reader. Dr. Jowett has the great faculty of vitalizing every part of the service. Most of all, perhaps, is this true of the pastoral prayer, which gathers up in unstereotyped phraseology the desires and needs of the people bowed before him: "And if any here feels that he has not been included in this prayer and that his wants have been left unexpressed, we pray for him also."

* * * * * * *

All that had gone before led up to the sermon. The music had ministered unity to the congregation. That multitude of diverse personalities had been imperceptibly welded into oneness as waiting worshipers in the house of God. Any feeling of curiosity had departed from the strangers. All were expectant of the message from the preacher. And such a message! The words, the tone of voice, the personality of the man, the atmosphere of the church, all are needed to give that sermon its power. The text was from Jesus' first sermon in his home town: "He hath sent me to heal the brokenhearted."

Dramatically, the broken-hearted of the city were set to marching in vast procession down Fifth avenue—the defeated, the disappointed, the mourners, the victims of disloyalty, the bereft of faith—what a company, from mansion and tenement, we saw that morning! And the picture was painted by one who seemed a brother to grief; he and his hearers entered into the fellowship of this suffering.

Then the sermon proceeded to show how Christ heals the brokenhearted by the gift of life, even as the anæmic are cured by the transfusion of blood; by a new viewpoint and attitude; by service of the suffering; by the "hope of the morning," the promise of the eternal day that is tearless. What an entrance into the very comfort of Christ that congregation was given!

More than one visitor carried away as a memento, stimulating to his own church, the calendar of services and meetings. This contained the list of benevolent objects to which the offerings of six months would be devoted. It bore the roster of officers with their addresses and a memorandum of meetings in the Fifth Avenue church on Sunday, Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday and Friday.

Most impressive of all was the record of activities of the church's mission, the John Hall Memorial, on the Upper East Side of New York. That simple catalogue of workers, dates and meetings opens a vista of ministry that stirs the heart. The mission is staffed by a pastor, a general secretary, a physical director, an office secretary, a chorister, an organist, a day nursery matron, a kindergartner, four women visitors, an Italian minister and an Italian visitor—a salaried corps of thirteen specialists. The significance of this has not had time to sink into the reader's consciousness before he is overwhelmed by the showing of fifty-six separate meetings during the week, to say nothing of the baths, the day nursery and kindergarten and the penny provident fund. THE WAYFARER.

No Unanimity Where He Was

In a middle Western city an important Presbyterian church was voting on a call to a new pastor. There were only a few negative votes, and the great majority in favor of the nominee was apparent. A gracious member of the minority moved to make the choice unanimous. But one man in that minority was by no means disposed to make any such soft surrender of opinion. In the midst of the company there rose up a stern old Scotchman. He wasted no words. His ultimatum was quick and straight.

"There's one thing ye might as well understand right here and now. I'll let ye know that there'll never be anything unanimous in this church as lang as I am in it."

And the meeting believed him. The motion was not put.

THE HOME COUNCIL

Mud Pies That Mother Doesn't Mind

BY MANTHEI HOWE

"OO-HOO-O-OO! OO-HOO! Ruthie!" "Comin'!" exclaimed my 4-year-old niece as she scuttled out the front door in answer to the call from the sidewalk. And then I deliberately eavesdropped. "Come on over to my house and play mud pies." "Why don't you play mud pies in my yard?" retorted Ruth. "I have a place where you can make the kind of mud pies that mother doesn't mind. It's lots of fun."

I sought Ruth's mother. "Ruth says she can make mud pies in her back yard, the kind mother doesn't mind. But how expurgated mud pies can be any fun is beyond me."

"Well, go and be convinced," advised my sister-in-law. "Just take a look at the sand table John made for Ruth."

It needed less than half a look to convince me that a sand table in the back yard or in the playroom is full of possibilities. As John had constructed it, the table could be used in any nursery without being messy or untidy. He took a large dry goods box 4x4 feet at the base and sawed it off at the sides until a railing four inches high was left. One end was fastened on with hooks, that it might be removed and the sand table cleaned when necessary. The table was lined with zinc, though oilcloth or linoleum would do as well. From the sawed off sides of the box he made four substantial legs that raised the table just high enough so that Ruth could play in it, her hands on a comfortable level for work when she was standing upright. Then the whole table was given a coat of bright red paint. When I commented on the brilliancy of his choice, John said that Ruth had made the selection of color. A load of clean sand, a pail of smooth pebbles which Ruth herself had collected, a trowel and a watering can completed the equipment of the sand table.

The sand must be sprinkled and stirred until it is evenly mixed and damp enough to mold readily and retain its form. Strings, twigs, pebbles, pieces of paper and tiny dolls lend vividness to the scenes on the sand table.

Sand Table a Satisfactory Avenue of Self-Expression

This table is merely another very satisfactory avenue for self-expression for the child. Drawing gives the same training in observation, also enabling the child to depict humans and animals; but the completed picture must always remain flat. It cannot give to the child the pleasure of reproducing the objects exactly as he sees them. The same is true of paper cutting. It is fascinating and a splendid training for the refinement of sight, attention, observation and measurement, and the coordination of muscles; but even the most beautiful cut-out is still only a cut-out, a silhouette. To complete the child's equipment for self-expression we need a plastic material.

Clay supplies this need to a certain extent, but after it has been worked and rolled for some time in warm little hands it becomes unsatisfactory for modeling and has to be dampened, kneaded and allowed to stand for some hours. For finer artistic work in modeling clay is of course the material par excellence. But when we want things expressed in a broad way, portraying scenes from stories or historical anecdotes, the most telling material at our command is the mud pie. The sand in the sand table must not be just dirt; it must be good sand, screened to prevent the danger of soft fingers being punctured by stray bits of glass.

At first glance the sand table may seem mere play, a conventionalized game of old-fashioned mud pie with a few extra trappings and knickknacks. It is more than that; like so much of the play materials for the modern child. it enables him to learn mucn that is distinctively educative while he plays. More and better than that, it brings these new impressions home to him in such a way that the memory stays with him.

You may read a story about an Indian village to your child, but he has not thoroughly classified and put the information it gives him in working order until he has reproduced the salient facts in drawing, paper cutting, clay modeling, on the sand or in story form. The story is valuable because it gives him a grasp of language, but the same training can be given when he is reproducing with his hands, and one of the greatest factors in the sand table work is the possibility for group work.

Most little people need to rub shoulders with their own kind before they acquire the correct social poise or feeling. By that word "social" I do not mean the child's relation to society as expressed in pink teas, but his relation to the social body as expressed in daily life. He must early learn to respect the rights of others. He must learn the law of "no trespass." The sand table is a fine field for just this training when the children can work in groups.

Group Work Trains Children to Respect Rights of Others

Ruth, her chum and I all worked at the sand table at the same time. But each had her own appointed task and her own allotment of the table. For instance, one day after they had listened wide-eyed to the old story of "The Three Bears," we decided to reproduce the tale on the sand table. Ruth at one end constucted Goldilocks's house; her chum took the forest with the flowers that tempted Goldilocks and the winding paths, while I was instructed to make the home of the three bears. Ruth did not like the house made entirely of sand because she had her mind made up that windows and a door that really showed were better, so these were made out of cardboard.

Benita made a forest by modeling the trunks of the trees from sand and then sticking aster branches in the tops for the foliage. All the paths were carefully outlined in tiny pebbles and delighted the neat youngster until Ruth remonstrated that "paths aren't like that in the woods."

"That's right, they're not," agreed Benita, and the pebbles were carefully picked up and put back in the pail, while she traced a path with her fingers.

When cold weather came the table was transferred to the playroom and we had glorious afternoons of mud pies. That winter John was reading aloud an account of the cliff dwellers in our own southwest. It evoked a great deal of discussion among the grown-ups in our family and evidently much of the talk seeped into Ruth's mind. One afternoon she astounded me by suggesting that we should build a colony of cliff dwellers.

We found some splendid illustrations in John's book and I took the responsibility of bringing it to the playroom. We modeled a fine overhanging cliff honeycombed with the queer dwellings of this interesting prehistoric people. I bought some tiny dolls, which the little girls decked out in red blankets and feathers filched from an abominable feather duster. Unfortunately the dolls were white. "But that doesn't matter!" exclaimed Benita; "we'll wrap them in the blankets and put feathers in their hair and make believe."

Story of Cliff Dwellers Offers Good Material for Reproduction

From the bare outline of the cliff dwellers' abode we passed on to a study and portrayal of some phases and customs of their lives. The children made pottery and instruments of clay to be used in this illustration of the ancient race. The ladder of thongs, the hole where they dumped refuse, all kinds of descriptive minutiæ were portrayed on the table.

If you imagine that the children will lack interest in detail and indulge in slipshod fooling at the sand table, just devote a week to showing them the importance and possibilities of sand. Have them illustrate the homes and stores in their own neighborhood. Then show them drawings of the homes of our American Indians, tepees, Indians about the camp fire, the well trodden path to the water supply, all these can be vividly reproduced in sand.

The Eskimos and Laplanders give fine opportunities for some very effective bits of sand stories. So do the South Africans with their thatched huts and any of the primitive people whose dwellings are easily constructed. You may make the work just as much play and just as educational as you please. But if you have to deal with a wideawake 4-year-old, you must first inform yourself thoroughly on your subject, for you will find that the children will ask you questions which, to be answered correctly, will require a definite knowledge.

The thing we construct with our hands we are quite likely to remember. Have the children, as much as possible, model something worth while. But the great secret of success in the use of the sand table is to present it always to the children in the form of play. Guide them when you can, but make yourself one with them, play and enjoy every minute at the sand table. When you or the children lose interest stop work immediately.

Verses Old and New

PEACE, NOT WAR

The servant of God who, at the age of 85, has composed these verses is sightless. His soul-vision, however, has enabled him to see clearly on the subject of war.

If nations would but, Christlike, see
War's horrors as they're proved to be,
Through orphans' tears and widows' pain,
They would from war fain to refrain.

If they saw war as just men do,
And kept God's holy law in view,
Which doth declare, "Thou shalt not kill,"
They'd legislate to do his will.

If they saw war in heaven's light,
And worked on lines of mutual right,
To banish war all would agree,
And "Peace on earth" would come to be.

The Prince of Peace has waited long,
With nations weak and nations strong
To honor him as their chief King,
And unto him their homage bring.

He will cut short his waiting day—
Since none have heard him to obey—
And come in power to prove his claim
That o'er all nations he will reign.

The golden rule should all control,
And be fixed in each nation's soul.
That cry should die, heard near and far,
"In time of peace prepare for war."

While the wish that war should cease
Has opened into steps for peace,
Let young and old awake and pray
That peace will come, and come to stay.

The Way She Understood It

Mark Twain, about the time that he was working hard upon one of the earlier books that brought him fame, sailed for a tour of Europe with his family.

He kept up his writing on shipboard and left it only at intervals for brief recreation.

One day, so the story runs, an approaching storm drove him inside the cabin and he went back to work, leaving word with his daughter, then a very little girl, to explain his absence.

"If they ask for me," he said to her, "say that I won't be long—I am only going to write an anecdote."

A little later the child was accosted by a passenger

"Where has your father gone?" was the inquiry.

"He won't be long," lisped the child obediently. "He saith he ith only going to ride a nanny goat."

The "Icon Not Made by Hands"

BY PRISCILLA LEONARD

EVERY RUSSIAN HOUSEHOLD has its icon—the sacred picture of Christ or the virgin or the saints. One of the favorite icons of the peasants of the Caucasus, so Stephen Graham, the traveler, tells us, is the "icon not made with hands"—the picture of Christ, painted in the guise of a peasant with a face of the peasant type, but noble and serene in expression. This icon is beloved by many Russian families above all their other possessions, for the legend of it is that it was taken from the very face of the Saviour and by his wish, for all men to see.

The legend is a beautiful one, told to every Russian peasant child at its mother's knee. Once upon a time, it runs, while Jesus was living on earth the fame of his healing miracles spread into Abyssinia, where the queen of the land lay dying. When she heard of the wonderful works of this great Teacher and how he had even raised the dead, she cried:

"If I might see him it is possible that I could live. But how could he come hither, so many miles over desert and mountain and sea, even for the healing of a queen?"

None of those round her could promise her that the Prophet of Nazareth could be brought. But as she lay and sadly waited for death, she fell into a gentle sleep and while she slept she dreamed. She dreamed that she heard a voice, sweeter than any voice on earth, and that the voice promised her, "Andray, the painter, shall bring you the face that shall save you."

Now the queen had never heard the name of Andray, neither did she know of any painter. But she told her maids and they sent out the heralds to sound the trumpets and proclaim throughout the land that Andray the painter must come to the palace.

As the proclamation sounded through one of the city streets Andray the painter heard it and obeyed its summons. He went to the palace and was taken to the queen's bedside. Pale and dying, she whispered the story of the dream, and Andray hastened off toward the Holy Land to find the famous Teacher.

The nearer Andray drew to Palestine, the more he heard of this wonderful Saviour. All the people were talking of his words and his miracles. At last, as the painter came to the hills which surround the Sea of Galilee, he saw a great throng, with the sick and the dying carried in its midst, pressing to the feet of One who stood high upon the hill slope clad in white raiment.

Andray pushed on quickly and joined the crowd. But he could not make his way through it. The people were pushing, and calling, and praying, and quarreling, and the sick were crying out, and it was impossible to get near to the Nazarene. So Andray left the throng, tired out, and climbed a steep slope across the valley facing the hill on which Christ stood. From this point, with his keen, trained eyes, he could see very clearly the face which the queen had commissioned him to paint; and he settled down to make his drawing.

Such a wonderful face it was, and so striking in its expression of love and power, that Andray felt he had found his highest ideal of what a human face might be. But lo! when he had sketched a few lines he looked at the drawing, comparing it with the face, and found it was very imperfect. He tried again, perplexed, and again he was dissatisfied. Three, four, five times he tried, but before he had done more than outline the features, he knew he had failed utterly. Then suddenly the reason came to him—the living face of the Nazarene changed as quickly and gloriously, each moment, as the flashing sun upon the waves. It was not a mere human face; it was a thousand faces in one, the image of every man's ideal.

As Andray laid down his brush in despair, the Teacher looked across the valley at him and smiled, and in the moment of that smile his face was like Andray's own, and the smile went deep into Andray's heart. The Nazarene beckoned; Andray passed, like one in a dream, over to the hill where he stood. One of the disciples met him and led him through the throng to Jesus; and Jesus looked upon him and said:

"My face may not be drawn by hands, lest in the days to come men should say, 'This only is the likeness of Christ.' There is not one face only, for all, but for each man there is his own vision of the face of Christ. There is one common knowledge for all; but that vision only each heart may know for itself. What wouldst thou, then?"

"I would," replied Andray, humbly, "that I had that likeness which belongs alone to my queen, and will save her."

Then Jesus took a coarse towel which one of the disciples carried and pressed it to his face and gave it to Andray. All who saw marveled, for on the cloth was imprinted the likeness of Jesus. Andray, wrapping it reverently and placing it in his robe, fell to his knees and besought a blessing.

"Thou couldst not draw my face," said Jesus, as he blessed the kneeling painter, "because of the reflection in it of the soul of every man. Behold, now, thou shalt never look upon the face of any man but thou shalt find my face there also."

Andray went away with the Saviour's blessing, and with the picture that was to save the queen. When the queen saw the cloth she cried out in joy and rose from her bed, restored to health.

The holy picture was set in a temple, where many miracles were wrought by it, the legend goes on. And Andray became the most wonderful painter in the land. He painted the portraits of many men, in whose faces he found always the look of Christ. He copied the marvelous picture that had saved the queen, and his copies became sacred icons; that is how Russia now has an "icon not made by hands," and the story that goes with it.

* * * * *

This story, of course you know, boys and girls, is just a bit of superstition, to be believed only by ignorant people, such as the Russian peasantry are. I have told it to you just for the one beautiful thought in it—that you may always find something of Christ in everyone we meet. Not anyone is wholly bad, or mean, or unkind. Even the wickedest has something in him that is like Christ—if you only look for it. Let's make it our task to look for it, always, this lovely, lovable thing, and forget the hateful qualities. God will look after those.

Operating on a Tiger

A well tiger is usually not a pleasant individual to handle. Can you imagine, then, the difficulty of handling a sick one? Such a task fell to Professor Samuel Haughton, according to The Westminster Gazette, when one of the tigers in the Dublin zoological gardens was threatened with gangrene in its paw, making an operation necessary.

Professor Haughton's experience was a thrilling one. The mate of the tiger was first secured in a side den. A net was thrown over the tiger and he was drawn forward to the door of the cage. Four stout keepers then held the feet of the struggling animal while Professor Haughton cut away the diseased claw.

The suffering beast furiously but vainly tried to get at him during the operation, but the rage of the tigress looking on through the bars of the side den was much more terrible to behold. She roared and violently threw herself against the barriers in her mad desire to go to the rescue of her mate.

When the tigress was admitted to the cage after the wound of her mate had been dressed, she turned up the paw and examined it with touching solicitude, and then licked her mate, as a cat licks her kittens, to soothe him, purring softly the while.

But perhaps the most extraordinary part of the affair was the sequel. A week later Professor Haughton was again at the zoo to see how his patient was getting on. When the animal espied him he began to pur like a cat, allowed him to examine the paw, and seemed pleased that he should do so.

My Dolly Dear and I

BY

KATHRYN C. WHEELER

Her name is Mary Clarabelle.
I know you'd love her, too,
If you could see how good she is—
And sweet and pretty, too;
For when I leave her by herself
She doesn't even cry!
And, oh, we have such lovely times,
My dolly dear and I.

But once, when we were playing house,
The wind came whirling round
And tipped her carriage till she 'most
Fell out upon the ground.
She didn't scream at all, she just
Held out her arms, and my!
But we did hug each other tight,
My dolly dear and I.

And when the dark has grown so black
You cannot see outside,
And all the great big bogy things
Come out from where they hide,
And creep behind us—still—as still—
We used almost to cry
For fear they'd grab us in the back—
My dolly dea. and I.

But mother says that when the wind
Had frightened dolly so,
I ran to take her in my arms
As fast as I could go.
And just like that, through all the dark,
More close than she can tell—
God's holding out his arms, she says,
To me and Clarabelle.

So now, when all the shiny stars
Have lighted up the night,
And mother tucks me up in bed,
All soft and warm and white,
We aren't a single bit afraid
Of bogy things. 'Cause why?
We snuggle safely in God's arms,
My dolly dear and I.

NEW BOOKS

Some Vital Books of the Year

Valuable New Letters

The Letters of Charles Eliot Norton is easily one of the foremost literary events of the season. Its importance is enhanced by the fact that the editing is so well done by his daughter, Miss Sara Norton, and by M. A. DeWolfe Howe. If pleasure in the total collection of letters did not submerge all spirit of criticism, we would probably wonder whether it would not have been well to leave out some of the references, such as the one which speaks of Clough as being "too intellectually sincere" to do what James Russell Lowell is described as doing in the matter of religion, and that in which a gift of the German emperor to Harvard is described in deliciously humorous terms which will be read with no great delight in Germany. This involves the whole question of editing, however, and the compilers may have felt that they had no right to delete such phrases. They seem hardly in the spirit of the man himself. Professor Norton had what President Patton once called "an aristocratic affinity for great men." In the literary world of his day he was on familiar terms with virtually all whose names have endured. His correspondence throws new light on the British and American circles which will not be duplicated, since he is almost the last of the group. Here are chatty letters to or about Carlyle, Ruskin, the Brownings, George Eliot, Burne-Jones, Leslie Stephen and others across the sea, and Emerson, Longfellow, Lowell, Fields, Furness, George William Curtis, Godkin and many more on this side. He presents a picture of Carlyle which has been needed for some time to correct an earlier distortion. Any life which stretched from 1827 to 1908 passed through several peculiarly interesting periods. It covered the civil and Spanish wars. Professor Norton felt keenly about both. The first came in his younger days, and he was strongly for the union once the war was on, though he had expected a division of the union and was willing it should come. His early letters reveal a grave distrust of Lincoln, but at the end of the war he counted the character of Lincoln its largest net product. The Spanish war came in Norton's later years, when he had lost a little of his courage and resiliency. He not only opposed it strongly, but bitterly, and at last despairingly. He wrote that the old America was gone, the America of his hopes and ideals, and he was not at all sure what the new America would come to. Indeed, it is noticeable that his declining years, while beautiful and rich, were shadowed by fear. He whistled bravely and declared his old faith in democracy, but he could not keep the note of fear out of his writing. Some of us would venture to feel that his agnosticism (he did not like so negative a word for his religious position) failed him, as it has done a good many men beside. The geography of Professor Norton's life includes chiefly New England, with occasional wanderings into other parts of the United States and of the Continent, particularly into his beloved Italy, whose Dante he made more vital to modern thinking than any other one man. His point of view is quite consistently that of New England. Professor Norton is one of the last of that brilliant group to which he naturally belonged, and there is a delightful fragrance in these remembrances. From "Cambridge from Within" Copyright, 1913, George W. Jacobs & Co., Philadelphia

Some Letters of William Vaughn Moody, edited, with introduction, by Daniel Gregory Mason. To the person whose friends regard him with suspicion as being "literary" this book will be one of the big events of the year. After reading the first three or four pages the reviewer tucked it away with the mental note that it must be "saved" for some long evening before the fire. It's too intimately revealing to skim over; it's too full of the intricacies and fascinations of literature as a profession too dominated by Moody's conscious ideal to win for language "some new swiftness, some rare compression," to admit of missing a single word. This man was almost as richly articulate in his letters as in his poetry; and while he shares very interestingly with other artists of his type a reticence in regard to facts that's more than compensated for by an expansive frankness in regard to mood, his letters offer a background of facts that make their author more tangible than he has yet appeared. To people who have known Moody only slightly, either as man or poet, a phrase or two have served to pigeonhole him — something about "high dignity" and "wealth of metaphor" and (less justly) "florid vocabulary." But to read Mr. Mason's preface (which, by the way, is a masterly thing), to absorb these letters and to pass from them, as one inevitably does, to a careful study of the poetry, is to realize an entirely new personality—one infinitely richer than we suspected before that tragic early death which robbed America of one of her supremest voices. Mr. Mason finds his admiration about equally divided between his friend's native imaginative luxuriance, and the rigorous discipline by which he trained it away from the rococo to the distinctive. As an example he includes the first and the final drafts of "Heart's Wild Flower" — and surely one has never seen a more valiant, wise and artistic example of poetic editing. There's a heroic vitalism in Moody's soul attitude. Mr. Mason puts it this way: "He was an enemy of nothing that is positive, but only of the negative things — doubt, cowardice, indifference, all ascetic denials of life." He was essentially human and broad-minded; Mr. Mason considers this the imperishable quality in his poetry and his most lovable trait as a man. The letters are addressed to many notable people — Richard Watson Gilder, Edmund Clarence Stedman, Percy MacKaye, Josephine Preston Peabody, Henry Miller and others. > "Let us consider how great a commodity of doctrine exists in books, how easily, how secretly, how safely they expose the nakedness of human ignorance without putting it to shame. These are the masters that instruct us without rods and ferulas, without hard words and anger, without clothes or money. If you approach them, they are not asleep; if investigating you interrogate them, they conceal nothing; if you mistake them, they never grumble; if you are ignorant, they cannot laugh at you."

Mary, Queen of Scots

The Tragedy of Mary Stuart, by Henry C. Shelley. For nearly twenty years Mr. Shelley has been studying the life of Mary Stuart, visiting the scenes with which it was associated, delving into documents hitherto unutilized, and otherwise endeavoring to understand her whom he calls "the most perennially fascinating figure in British history." She lived for forty-two years. But fifteen months sufficed to cover the events which chiefly make her tragic history the subject of discussion and partisanship unparalleled. Those events were: The murder of Darnley, the marriage with Bothwell, the imprisonment in Lochleven and the defeat at Langside. Mr. Shelley has felt that existing biographies dwell too much on the details of Mary's life in France, on her coming to Scotland and on the long years of her imprisonment, and do not throw into sufficiently bold relief the swift succession of incidents which cost her her throne, her liberty, her love and presently her life. Also, in his acquaintance with the really vast literature Mary Stuart has inspired, Mr. Shelley has felt the er than interpretations. He has striven to meet these lacks, and his book is a scholarly piece of work certain to win a permanent place in the literature about Mary Stuart. Mr. Shelley writes with vigor and he thinks in a clear-headed, sturdy fashion. He accepts as unquestionable the validity of the casket letters which Mary's advocates have ever been obliged to repudiate if they would maintain their advocacy. Accepting these, there is no possibility of gainsaying Mary's illicit relations with Bothwell before Darnley's murder, or her complicity in that poor craven's taking off. And yet, even when these heinous things be admitted against her, there remains enough of haplessness and party, just as "strenuous" had attracted him in heroism to keep her secure in her kingdom of our hearts. We no longer demand that our heroes or even our heroines be above temptation. The amount of very human nature in spite of which they were, on the whole, courageous and kind is what endears them to us. Mr. Shelley has brought Mary nearer to us than almost any other writer has. CLARA E. LAUGHLIN.

MARY, QUEEN OF SCOTS, by Hilda T. Skae, is a book of pictures and text, the latter evidently put together by a conscientious but wholly uninspired literary "hack" for the sole purpose of "conveying" the four-and-twenty illustrations; many of them, reproduced in colors, are from paintings which the dramatic incidents of Mary's life have inspired. They are worthy of a better text. [Frederick A. Stokes Company, New York. $1.75 net.

Biographies and Reminiscences

THE REMINISCENCES OF AUGUSTUS SAINT-GAUDENS, edited and amplified by Homer Saint-Gaudens. A season that is unusually rich in biography, reminiscence and correspondence, and that shows rather a dearth of historical works, has as its crowning interest the memoirs of our late foremost sculptor, Saint-Gaudens. The unique thing about it is its broad human appeal, for here is a record of life rather than of art, and as such it transcends in interest the typical artist biography. Mr. Saint-Gaudens had a horror of "art talk" and he states very clearly at the beginning that the reader who hopes to find a disquisition on art and the production of artists had better close the book at once. "Moreover, I will not indulge in any acrimonious opinions, delightful as it is to do, because I have few. And even where they do exist I should hesitate, since, for instance, nothing biting that I might say about the policeman who put me in prison when I was 19 could be strong enough to satisfy me." His son tells delightfully of his father's reluctance to express opinions on art and sculpture due to a faith founded more on intuition than on theory or reason. Often he would say, "I could not answer that man, but I know he is wrong." Saint-Gaudens's ancestry was a blend of French and Irish; his father was a vivid, eccentric man, with a "Gascon imagination," born at the foot of the Pyrenees, a shoemaker by trade who came to New York when Augustus was very young and established a clientele that included such names as Governor Morgan, General Dix, some of the Astors, Belmonts and so on. Augustus's earliest memories are of the Bowery, West Broadway, the Canal street ferry, of art study at Cooper Union and the National Academy of Design, of Lincoln and the war; and from these beginnings on through the more interesting portions of his life these two handsome volumes read so absorbingly that it's almost impossible to put them aside. This is a story of art plus sanity, of genius minus pose, of wholesomeness, simplicity, humor and fine, clean living. As such it's likely to have very few rivals. The illustrations are innumerable and of peculiar value and interest. [Century Company, New York. $7 net.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT: An Autobiography. Theodore Roosevelt is the most virile and interesting personality in the western hemisphere —this can be said without in any way detracting from his great and good contemporaries—and this new book by him and about him makes a vigorous course of reading on present-day politics and society, their development and tendencies, their hopeful promise and their dangerous potentialities. There is the meat of a sermon in the "foreword," dated at Sagamore Hill just before the colonel sailed for South America. In it are found the keynotes of his career. He would combine practical efficiency and lofty idealism, a love of peace with courage, collective power and individual duty, initiative and responsibility. Justice, he believes, and the uplifting of humanity can be brought about only by strong and daring men who love peace "but who love righteousness more than peace." He would have us ashamed at the thought of shirking the hard work of the world but at the same time wants to delight (as he himself does) in the many-sided beauty of life. Again, he voices charity for the wrongdoer and relentless war for wrongdoing. But the book is not made up of preachment by any means. Its 650 pages are full of personal and national history as entertaining and far more profitable than fiction. Here is the life history of a boy lack of nonpartisan writing, of chronicles rath- who was born an aristocrat, a weakling as a youth, who became a western ranchman, a husky specimen of manhood, a democrat and a friend of all kinds of men, an aggressive reformer, a restless official, a soldier, a governor, a president and a world figure. To students of psychology as well as to spectators of and participants in current affairs the absorbing feature of this autobiograhpy will be the unfolding of Mr. Roosevelt's mind, the changing of his intellectual and moral and social viewpoint after he had left college. New ideas have constantly come to him—are coming to him—and his heart and brain are always receptive. No wonder the word "progressive" appealed to him as an appellation for a political the days of his greatest physcal vim. The book will prove a veritable mine for information and discussion. There are handsome pictures by the score. [Macmillan Company, New York. $2.50 net.

THE LIFE OF JOHN BRIGHT, by George Macaulay Trevelyan. Since the death of John Bright in 1889 there has been a growing sense of need for an accurate biography. At last it appears and immediately takes its place with Morley's Cobden and his Gladstone. The three of them give more than an account of three lives; they describe a movement in democracy, the most notable of English history in the nineteenth century. This biography is a striking commentary on a familiar saying of Lawrence Godkin that you may rail at "mere talk" as much as you please, but nothing really gets done until there has been a vast deal of talking about it. Bright was one of the men who talked England into the repeal of the burdensome corn laws, the control of the landlord power, the extension of the franchise and every widespread and beneficent movement of his day. He was a Quaker by inheritance and by conviction, opposing war, but a constant warrior in the battles of peace. The severest strain that came on his popularity was at the time of the Crimean war, which he opposed steadily. How deeply he felt the injustice and unwisdom of it appears in the speeches he made, chief among them the famous angel of death oration, after which Disraeli said, "Bright, I would give all I ever had to have made that speech you made just now." To which Bright replied, "Well, you might have made it if you had been honest." Americans will follow with interest the record of his correspondence with Sumner regarding our civil war. From the first he was with the antislavery party and when war was declared became a consistent friend of the union and of President Lincoln, for whom he had the highest regard. His attitude led him into opposition to Mr. Gladstone and into great disfavor with cotton workers, and it was at his suggestion that three ships were laden with flour in New York and sent to the distressed mill operatives whose cotton supply was cut off by the war. He advised it as a piece of influential argument, and it had weight. His opposition to Gladstone's home rule plan for Ireland makes enlightening reading in these days when a modified form of that plan is now to be put into operation. His position did not involve dislike of Ireland but love for the empire, which he thought would be weakened by division of parliamentary responsibility. The letters and addresses reveal a strong religious faith, generous but positive. He was the first Nonconformist to sit in the English cabinet, and when he was presented to the queen he declined to wear "livery," as he called the court dress, or to kneel when he kissed her hand. The queen dreaded him, but her fears were soon allayed by the open loyalty of her Quaker subject. As he neared his death, a remark often made hinted at one of the springs of his power: "There is nothing in the world that gives me as much pleasure as poetry—except little children." His eyes were to the future, where children meet their destinies, and by all that was in him he was committed to making it a good future. [Houghton Mifflin Company, Boston. $4.50.

THE LIFE OF LYMAN TRUMBULL, by Horace White. Probably no living man with equal ability as a writer had such opportunity to know Lyman Trumbull as did Horace White, the veteran journalist. That he should have been chosen as the senator's biographer is singularly fortunate. Mr. White's early experience was in Illinois and he was 20 years old when in 1854 he first heard Lincoln speak from the platform. Trumbull was born in Connecticut in 1813, spent three years as a school principal in Georgia, where he read law during his leisure hours, and located in Belleville, Ill., in 1837. Three years later the young lawyer found himself a member of the state legislature with Lincoln, McClernand, E. D. Baker and others afterwards to reach fame. From this time on his career is associated with the stirring political events that relate themselves to the breach between the states and the decade following the civil war. In 1841 the Democrat Trumbull was appointed secretary of state of Illinois to succeed Douglas. Two years later he opposed Governor Ford on the bank question and resigned by request. He served several years following 1848 as a supreme judge; resigned that office and was later elected to congress, but was almost immediately chosen to the senate. By this time he had become quite definitely aligned with the element which was to give power to the new Republican party. Firm in his convictions, generally consistent in expression, an able speaker and a clear thinker, he was a most useful servant of the people during a trying period of the nation's history. His confidence in Lincoln was only tested by what he considered to be an insufficiently energetic prosecution of the war, yet his record shows no act of disloyalty to the executive. After the war he drafted the final form of the thirteenth amendment to the constitution and maintained a conservative position during the exciting days of reconstruction and attempted impeachment. Trumbull joined in the liberal republican revolt of 1872 and paid the penalty by retirement from office in 1880 as the unsuccessful Democratic candidate for governor, and before his death in 1896 he had come to support many of the tenets of the short-lived Populist party. To portray Trumbull's life is to tell the story of America's most interesting political period. Mr. White has given us a history rather than an intimate personal biography, but it is history at its brilliant best. [Houghton Mifflin Company, Boston. $3 net.

MEMOIRS OF LI HUNG CHANG, edited by William Francis Mannix, with introduction by John W. Foster. The last dozen years have made history so rapidly in China that Li Hung Chang and his time seem to have been pushed very far back; yet this Chinese patriot, whose first great service to his country was his large part in crushing the Taiping rebellion, helped pave the way for present-day China by his last loyal service, when, an old man already stricken and near death, he stood forth to save the imperial government from the threatened results of its insane policy in the Boxer troubles. He was in retirement when this movement began; he did his utmost to forestall it, and his appeals to Yuan Shih Kai to use his influence against it have in this day a strange sound. These memoirs are only extracts representing a small part of the voluminous writings left by Li. They cover half a century, and reveal in a most illuminating way the personality of a great and, according to his ideals, a high-minded man. His education was not the Occidental, but that of the Chinese classics, in which he gained the highest honors and had the highest ambitions. In early life he shared in the prevalent hatred of foreigners and their ways, but a growing acquaintance with them worked a gradual and complete revolution. The recorded inmost thought of this man, as he comments upon those affairs of vast moment with which for decades he was so intimately and prominently identified, cannot fail to be of absorbing interest to the student of Chinese history. REMINISCENCES OF A SOLDIER'S WIFE, by Mrs. John A. Logan. The distinguished American who stands as the hero of these pages was more than a soldier—he was an able participant in the political affairs of the nation before and after the civil war. His loyalty to the union in the trying days when every man's position was sternly in question did much to strengthen the national cause in southern Illinois, where he had a large following; and his later services in the field and at home were of immeasurable value. Mrs. Logan, with her fine gift for writing, has pictured most vividly the ante-bellum days in Illinois and at Washington, the experiences she shared in the field, and General Logan's closing career as a statesman. The glowing ardor of the admiring wife is evident throughout the narrative, but no one would begrudge that tribute to a man so well entitled to public honor. This book will take its place with the best of biographies helping to fix the record of the men who figured in one of the most important periods of American history. A number of very interesting photographs are included. [Charles Scribner's Sons, New York. $2.50 net.

BRIGHAM YOUNG AND HIS MORMON EMPIRE, by ex-Senator Frank J. Cannon and George L. Knapp. Both friend and foe must recognize that Brigham Young was one of the most interesting men in American history. He was preacher, pioneer, prophet, pope and polygamist all in one. This book tells the story of his life in a fashion worthy of its theme. It traces him from his birth in Vermont in 1801 through his early poverty, his Methodism, to his death in Salt Lake City in 1877 with vast wealth and leadership in the religious empire he had established. Some of the phrases of the book are peculiarly suggestive. If Joseph Smith was "the prophet of Mormonism," Brigham Young was "its business manager." "Mormonism is the Mohammedanism of the West." The account of the early experiences of the Mormons is given with manifest fairness, the gentiles receiving the blame which many of them deserved for the persecutions which cast a halo on early Mormon history in the eyes of its believers. As Senator Cannon says, however, all these persecutions sink into insignificance in the presence of the massacre at Mountain Meadows, the historic responsibility for which he places squarely on the shoulders of Brigham Young. The analysis of polygamy as an essential element in Mormonism is very keen, and the book ought to give additional warning to American citizens that polygamy must yet be reckoned with as long as Mormonism exists. It is rooted in the very system itself. This book ought to take its place among the authoritative biographies of this curious instance of a political-religious American. Certainly it should have immediate acceptance in the needed campaign of patriotic education on the subject of the insidious evil of this great political and commercial power that is antagonistic to the ideals of the republic. LIFE AND LETTERS OF JANE AUSTEN: A Family Record, by William and Richard Arthur Austen-Leigh. It was Mark Twain's opinion that "any library is a good library which does not contain the works of Jane Austen." What he would have said about her "Life and Letters" we can only conjecture. There are persons of unquestionable taste and intelligence who read with pleasure her novels—witness that gracious, lovable friend of Samuel Clemens's who wrote "My Mark Twain"; but it scarcely seems possible that there can be persons who will persevere through more than 400 octavo pages of this dreary book. There are lives whose minutest detail possesses a never-failing fascination for us. The fact that Charles Lamb once acquired "a new coat with a velvet collar" has been made precious for all time by his whimsical comment thereon. We cherish the revelation that Shelley disdained mealtimes and soared as fetterless as the skylark, with a handful of raisins in his pocket to fortify him against hunger. We're delighted to learn that Browning had a passion for buying old chests of drawers, despite Elizabeth's protest that the Casa Guida menage needed spoons. But it doesn't seem possible to feel concerned about Jane's revelation that "I mean to have some haricot mutton tomorrow," nor her confession that at a certain ball "nobody asked me the first two dances," nor her declaration to her brother, on the night of their father's death, "We have lost an excellent father. . . . The serenity of the corpse is most delightful." Her life was a round of haricot mutton and country visits and family gossip and authorship—without thrills. One great, poignant moment can raise all the haricot mutton details in a life to the level of vital interests. But Jane never had that moment. [E. P. Dutton and Company, New York. $3 net.

THE SPIRITUAL DRAMA IN THE LIFE OF THACKERAY, by Nathaniel Wright Stephenson. In this scholarly monograph Professor Stephen-

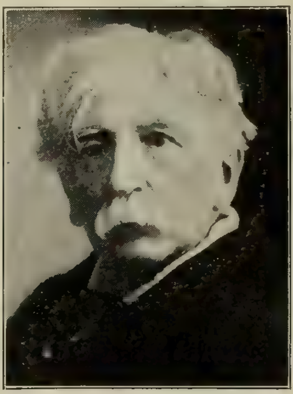
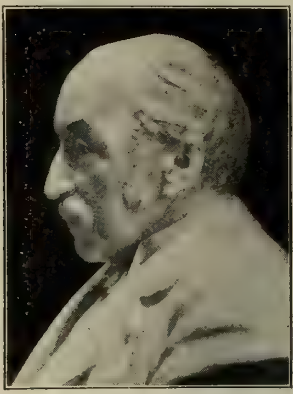
GRAHAM TAYLOR



WILLIAM WINTER



CHARLES ELIOT NORTON

son has considered the life and work of the great Victorian novelist from a new but interesting viewpoint. That Thackeray's life contained more of sorrow than happiness all who are familiar with his biography are aware. That he was one of the kindest, gentlest and most lovable of men, that he maintained a serenity of spirit and optimistic outlook in private life is of course widely acknowledged; but his critics find him bitter and cynical as a novelist, and it is against this charge that Mr. Stephenson so valiantly and intelligently defends him. The fact that "the majority of Thackeray's men of power were scoundrels" he attributes to the literary motive of the age, which was "the conquest of evil over good." "Dickens broke boldly through such thinking, but his was not the mood of the time." Professor Stephenson calls attention to the fact that there is a marked change in the spiritual quality of Thackeray's work during the latter twenty years of his life. The fatalistic note predominating in "Vanity Fair" is much less apparent in "The Newcomes" and scarcely perceptible in the unfinished fragments of "Denis Duval," which so clearly teaches that "no good is ever lost." A book of vital import. [George H. Doran Company, New York. $1.25 net.

Hawthorne and His Publisher, by Caroline Ticknor. This volume is that rarely interesting and illuminating thing—the intimate record of a novelist's relationship with his publisher, written by the publisher's granddaughter. Hawthorne and William Davis Ticknor, who established the "Old Corner Book Store" which became the nucleus of New England literary life, were the most devoted friends from the time of Hawthorne's shy introduction of himself to that last sad journey during which they both died. They spent hours together in the counting room of the book store; they went on numerous little travels together, Hawthorne always concealing his identity in the hotel registers under the incognito of "a friend"; they wrote innumerable letters to each other, many of which are included here; chiefly they were friends because of many spiritual congenialities, the sturdy, active Ticknor supplementing and being supplemented by the dreamy, timid novelist. This book about them is full of those intimate personal touches that people want concerning their literary heroes. One of the year's delightful gift books, fragrant with memories of Boston of more than fifty years ago. [Houghton Mifflin Company, Boston. $3 net.

Anthony Trollope, His Work, Associates and Originals, by T. H. S. Escott, is an appreciative and unbiased biography of one of the foremost novelists of the Victorian age, containing interesting sidelights on the literati and intellectual spirit of the period. For more than thirty years Anthony Trollope was actively identified with the postal service, largely in the capacity of inspector in Ireland and England. It was in Ireland that he first turned his attention to literature, continuing his labors until his death, at which time he was engaged on his sixty-third work. His first two novels, "The Macdermots of Ballycloran" and "The Kelleys and the O'Kellys," received scant recognition and it wasn't until the advent of "Framley Parsonage" that he won popular favor in England. Thereafter the successive installments of his stories were as eagerly awaited as those of Dickens and Thackeray. His early model he found in Jane Austen, but his later works show the influence of Thackeray, under whose ægis he began his literary and social life in London. He became one of the Sunday habitues at the home of Mr. and Mrs. G. H. Lewes. Just how far Trollope's views of life and character were influenced by George Eliot it is impossible to determine, but there is a perceptible parallel in their literary courses. There he met Spencer, Tyndall, Browning and Leighton and occasionally Tennyson. Mr. Escott knew the celebrated author intimately, securing from him the copious notes which make possible this interesting volume. [John Lane Company, New York. $3.50 net.

The Life of Robert Toombs, by Ulrich B. Phillips of the University of Michigan. This is a very clear and readable analysis of the public career of a distinguished if not altogether successful Southern statesman. Toombs was courageous, energetic and intellectually keen; but his qualities were not sufficiently in balance to make him a truly great man. Nevertheless he bore a part in American affairs that history cannot ignore. The estimate of Toombs's personality by Gamaliel Bradford, recently published in The Atlantic, will properly supplement Professor Phillips's discussion of the famous Georgian's public life. The Life of Henry Labouchere, by Algar Labouchere Thorold. "I do not mind Mr. Gladstone always having an ace up his sleeve, but I do object to his always saying that Providence put it there," drawled Labouchere gently one evening in the lobby of the house of commons. Such was his humor; his originality consisted in saying the unconventional things people think and don't express, as when someone asked him whether he liked Mme. X——. "Oh, yes, I like her well enough, but I shouldn't mind if she dropped dead in front of me on the carpet." This book is full of such anecdotes, as well as a bulk of solid information about the life of this man who was essentially French in type and who carved out his career in England. It has been an exhaustive task to make up this substantial biography and those people who read it will be repaid. It makes brilliant commentary upon the political history of the last quarter century. Princess and Queen of England: Life of Mary II., by Mary F. Saunders. A biography of the daughter of James II. who, with her Dutch husband, William, came to the rescue of English Protestantism with the revolution of 1688. The confusion of the times and the tendencies begotten by the uprising against James II. required strong guiding hands at the helm of government. William and Mary proved themselves quite sufficient for the task, but Mary's part was especially trying. By her natural affection she was drawn towards her father. Her Protestant religious training, however, enabled her to see the danger to England in James II.'s stubborn Romanist policy, and her sense of duty both as a member of the church of England and as the wife of the Calvinistic prince of Orange bound her sternly to the necessity of acting against her father. Thus the story of her life comes to be one of the most interesting as well as instructive dramatizations of the moral-psychological problem. The author of her biography (the first to be written with adequate detail and vivid coloring) has given us a fascinating and informing book. [Duffield and Company, New York. $3.50 net.

Madame Royale, by Ernest Daudet; translated by Mrs. Rodolph Stawell. Everyone reads with breathless interest the story of Mme. Royale's days in the temple prison during the Terror, where her mother, father and aunt went to the guillotine and where in a room beneath her the little dauphin, her brother, died. In this volume M. Daudet has told a continuous narrative reenforced by a number of fresh details which he has recently uncovered. He is a student of history at its sources and has been specially favored by several persons who have in their possession letters and other documents, hitherto unpublished, by Mme. The Story-Life of the Son of Man: Nearly a Thousand Stories from Sacred and Secular Sources in a Continuous and Complete Chronicle of the Earth Life of the Saviour, by Wayne Whipple. Written for the general reader—even for the nonreader—this unique and comprehensive method of presenting the life of Christ in a panoramic view ought to find a boundless audience. For parents, ministers, teachers—particularly in connection with the international Sunday school lessons—it needs only a trial to demonstrate its invaluableness. Anthony Comstock: Fighter, by Charles Gallaudet Trumbull. The mother of Anthony Comstock on Sundays told her children deeds of men and women who sacrificed self for principle. This book may well serve as a fountain of similar stories to the children of this day. The volume is an authorized biography done in a manner which invites reading. It opens with young Comstock at 16 years killing two mad dogs in his Connecticut village and relates in graphic manner his unceasing fight against publishers and vendors of obscene books and cards and other forms of vice. It is a book to inspire war for decency in men of this generation. [Fleming H. Revell Company, New York. $1.25 net.

Robert Louis Stevenson's Edinburgh Days, by E. Blantyre Simpson. Stevensoniana has been definitely expanded this year by a new volume which collects all the principal records of Stevenson's boyhood and young manhood in Edinburgh. R. L. S., by Francis Watt, is an unpretentious but reliable biography which will serve adequately as a sort of guide book of Stevenson's comings and goings, with a running comment on his literary production and personal relationships and a critical estimate of him as man and writer. The incipient library will need this book. [Macmillan Company, New York. $1.50.

Fifteen Years of a Dancer's Life, by Loie Fuller. In the course of her highly successful career Miss Fuller has visited many interesting places and met many interesting people. Gentlemen Rovers, by E. Alexander Powell. Biographies of nine of America's "forgotten heroes" who have never received fitting recognition. First comes General John Parker Boyd, "who rendered most gallant service to his own people." A chapter is devoted to Jedediah Smith, whom California has failed to honor, although "he was the real founder of the overland trail." Mr. Powell also pays tribute to William Walker, Frederick Townsend Ward and Captain Samuel Chester Reid, the invincible commander of the General Armstrong. Written by a man of intensely patriotic spirit, this book combines romance with accuracy and should strongly appeal to every American citizen. [Charles Scribner's Sons, New York. $1.50.

Some New Historical Studies

Professor McMaster has brought to a conclusion his remarkable History of the United States with the eighth volume (D. Appleton and Company, New York; $2.50 net). Covering the momentous period from 1850 to 1861, the book is probably the most important of the entire series. Particularly does it exhibit the rare value of Professor McMaster's work in its treatment of the Kansas border war, with the later John Brown episode, and of the Mormon rebellion. Those who are not awake to the necessity for a vigilant attitude toward the Mormon power as a patriotic precaution should study the early history of the Utah settlement. Those who assume that the labor question has taken serious form only with recent developments of unionism may be instructed by the chapter dealing with the industrial situation in 1857—and, indeed, by similar reviews of other periods in earlier volumes. Taken through all its pages, this is a history that has no equal in its faithful revelation of American life during the first eighty years of the republic.

In A Confederate Girl's Diary we have Mrs. Sarah Morgan Dawson's youthful impressions of war as she saw it in Baton Rouge, at the various plantations where her family found refuge, and in New Orleans. A generous, impulsive, altogether charming girl she must have been. Though suffering with her people many of the hardships inflicted by war upon the innocent—her beautiful home was vandalized without the slightest justification—her anger was always tempered by a broad kindliness that has not been evidenced by many woman analists of the war. Because of this spirit the book has a value much beyond its claims as a purely historical record. Miss Morgan married Captain Dawson, an Englishman in the Confederate service, lived for years in South Carolina and died in Paris. [Houghton Mifflin Company, Boston. $2 net.]

The Major Operations of the Navies in the War of American Independence, by Alfred T. Mahan, first appeared in the comprehensive "History of the Royal Navy," edited by Lord Clowe. It is a tribute to Admiral Mahan's historical impartiality that this material, prepared first for the British public, is now published for American readers, and that it will be accepted by both constituencies as authoritative. The part played by our improvised navy in checking British advances—notably on Lake Champlain—and the influence of distant naval operations upon the war in America are here given proper importance. Portraits, maps and diagrams accompany the text. Admiral Mahan's introduction, recently written, is an admirable statement in behalf of military preparedness by a friend of peace. The American Civil War, by James K. Hosmer. The Appeal to Arms. The Outcome. The admirable narrative of the great war of 1861-5 prepared by Dr. Hosmer for "The American Nation"—the highly valued historical work edited by Albert Bushnell Hart—is now presented in separate form at a modest price. The story of this remarkable conflict has never been related more interestingly, while the historical perspective is consistently presented throughout. The work therefore is eminently of value to both the student and the unprofessional reader. [Harper and Brothers, New York. Two volumes. Set $3.] Oliver R. Williamson.

One Hundred Years of Peace, by Henry Cabot Lodge. From the signing of the treaty of Ghent on Christmas eve, 1814, until the declaration by Mr. Balfour in 1898 that "the time may come—nay, the time must come—when some statesman of authority, more fortunate even than President Monroe, will lay down the doctrine that between English-speaking peoples war is impossible," peace has reigned between the mother country and the United States. With the dawn of another year that era of peace will be a century in length and Mr. Lodge in these pages both celebrates it and describes is dispassionately. He shows that the century of peace has not been uninterruptedly one of good will. But the book ends on the optimistic note sounded in the words of Mr. Balfour, and no sane man could bear to look forward to any other consummation of the relation of the two countries. Men Around the Kaiser: Makers of Modern Germany, by Frederic W. Wile. Since the Franco-Prussian war of 1870—that marvelous diplomatic stroke by Bismarck—Germany has become a world power. The story of her growth to world domination shared with three supreme powers is the tale of individual heroes. Who those heroes are one may learn in this very readable volume. By sharp hewing away of his materials Mr. Wile, who is Berlin correspondent for great American newspapers, has produced that which is essential—and that alone. His striking accounts of these thirty men, among whom are Von Tirpitz, Ballin, Gwinner, Bebel, Reinhardt, Strauss, Scherl, will be remembered for their vividness. [J. B. Social and Economic Forces in American History, edited by Albert Bushnell Hart, is a consecutive and succinct epitome of American social life, taken from a monumental work in twenty-seven volumes edited by Professor Hart. One can, if one has sufficient imagination, construct from this valuable little book the whole social life of the early periods of American history. It is the work of sixteen of the twenty author-scholars who contributed to the larger work mentioned. [Harper and Brothers, New York. $1.50 net.

Poetry Old and New

The Works of Francis Thompson, in three volumes. The event of the year in poetry is this publication of the collected verse and prose of the man who wrote the reverberant "Hound of Heaven." It would take several thousand words adequately to discuss this classicist's work and as many more to quote lines and passages that ought to be emblazoned on the memories of poetry lovers. It must suffice here to say that the three volumes have been bound and printed in perfect taste, each of them containing a beautiful photogravure portrait of the author at different ages. [Charles Scribner's Sons, New York. The set $5.50 net; also sold separately.

Poems, by Alice Meynell. Another publication of supreme importance is Mrs. Meynell's collected verse, which has been brought out in the most ravishing small volume containing a photogravure portrait of the author from a drawing by Sargent. There's so much real poetry between these covers that the critic can't begin upon its beauty in a limited space. But at least it's interesting to note that the "Renouncement" (which Rossetti called one of the finest things in all modern poetry), the "Letter from a Girl to Her Own Old Age" and several others of the most significant poems are included in the early period of Mrs. Meynell's production. [Charles Scribner's Sons, New York. $1.50 net.

Collected Poems, by Alfred Noyes. In two well-printed but rather unattractively bound volumes has been gathered the complete poetry of this young Englishman who was named as the possible laureate. Mr. Noyes has written as prolifically and as thoughtfully as those older English poets whose mantle he is proving so worthy of. He's much given to the epic—so much so that it's difficult to find many of the short lyrics one likes to keep singing in his heart. But Mr. Noyes is a poet of big, fine qualities—stirring, golden, beautiful—with very little of the fainting Swinburnian ecstasy. [Frederick A. Stokes Company, New York. $3.

Lyrics and Dramas, by Stephen Phillips. These poems reveal the fine appreciation of color, exquisite imagery and elusive fancy we have learned to associate with Mr. Phillips. Lyrics for the most part, songs of land and sea, phases of nature and love, always with a minor cadence, even in "April" with its wealth of color. There are also poems of philosophy, some of them vibrating with the tragedy of life, and three dramas in blank verse possessing that tragic intensity with a reticence and dignity of treatment which are so suggestive of the Greek. "The King," one of Mr. Phillips's biggest achievements, forcibly recalls "Œdipus." [John Lane Company, New York. $1.25 net.

Poems, by Herbert Kaufman. A miscellaneous collection of verses many of which have appeared in the magazines. Mr. Kaufman expresses himself with the unashamed honesty of the realist who has a message to deliver, portraying life as we know it in the twentieth century. He writes of the joy of living, of the strife and struggle of the worker and social wrongs with the convincing power of one who has been in the thick of the fight and bears the scars of battle. [George H. Doran Company, New York. $1.25 net.

Salt Water Ballads, by John Masefield, is a new edition of verses which first appeared ten years ago. They have a tang of the salt air, are splendidly virile and abound with the quaint fancies, superstitions and vernacular of the seamen. While not all are of equal quality, each has a depth of feeling that makes it unforgettable. [Macmillan Company, New York. $1 net.

The Little Book of Modern Verse: Selections from the Work of Contemporaneous American Poets, by Jessie B. Rittenhouse. A valuable little volume representing the new and interesting work of poets not yet very familiar to the general reader—Wytter Bynner, Louis Untermeyer, Nicholas Vachel Lyndsey and many others—besides such well-known ones as Bliss Carman, Madison Cawein, etc. On the whole the selections are well made. One does wonder, however, why Mr. Bynner's poignant "Union Square" seems never to get itself included. The volume is pocket size and is very attractively bound in dull green. [Houghton Mifflin Company, Boston. $1 net.

Poems and Ballads, by Hermann Hagedorn. A new edition of a poetical collection whose keynote seems to be sanity, sympathy and strength. Essays, General Literature

The Summit of the Years, by John Burroughs. One can think of no more satisfying gift for the thoughtful reader than this "harvest" of Mr. Burroughs's. "Written in the overtime I have made since I passed the spiritual limit of threescore and ten years," these miscellaneous essays represent the rich product of a mind that has chosen nature as its closest friend. Mr. Burroughs says there's one thing he's quite certain he's got to the end of—the vexed question of the animal mind. His solution is startlingly simple, throwing a powerful searchlight on the inconclusiveness of science. [Houghton Mifflin Company, Boston. $1.15 net.

Greek Imperialism, by William Scott Ferguson. To make this book Professor Ferguson has added somewhat to the Lowell Institute lectures delivered by him in February. His aim is to deal not with Greek history, but with Greek purpose, spirit and methods, and he includes only so much historical matter as is necessary to this end. He uses the term "imperialism" not to indicate a form of government, but rather that domination which the Greek states were ambitious to exercise both over their kindred states and foreign peoples —an ambition which the republics eagerly shared. The means used to gain and exercise this control are shown in their development from the time of Athens and Sparta through that of Philip and Alexander and the latter's successors. It is a most illuminating book, and one of interest and importance to the student of Greek history. [Houghton Mifflin Company, Boston. $2 net.

History as Literature and Other Essays, by Theodore Roosevelt. "From the standpoint of the nation and from the broader standpoint of mankind, scholarship is of worth chiefly when it is productive, when the scholar not merely receives but gives." This quotation from one of the essays expresses Mr. Roosevelt's conviction, on which he himself acts, concerning the duty of the man who has leisure to study. Some of the essays appeared in The Outlook and The Century and several are addresses given before various bodies; three of them were included in a previous volume. Many persons will gladly welcome this collection of some of the best of the recent writings of this famous politician, hunter and publicist. [Charles Scribner's Sons, New York. $1.50.

Joyous Gard, by Arthur Christopher Benson. Mr. Benson believes that, as Sir Lancelot had his castle, Joyous Gard, in which he sought repose from worldly stress and strain, so to each of us is possible a stronghold of thought to which we may retire for seasons of rest and refreshment. He tells in this collection of brief essays something of the way we must follow to gain our Joyous Gard, which shall be ours only when we have nurtured those finer, sweeter thoughts which often perish from indifference and neglect. Harvest Home, by E. V. Lucas, is a companion volume to "A Little of Everything" and is composed, with only two exceptions, of extracts from the author's previous work. They well merit new publication, however, because of their whimsical humor, good-natured satire and practical philosophy. A delightful volume for the guest room table, as almost anyone can find something of especial interest in this varied collection. [Macmillan Company, New York. $1 net.

The Drama

The Wallet of Time: Personal, Biographical and Critical Reminiscence of the American Theatre, by William Winter. This veteran dean of our dramatic critics has gathered together his memories of the American theater—stretching over a period of almost sixty years—in two octavo volumes of magnificent make-up. His original plan was to write a comprehensive history of the theater in America, showing the action and reaction of society and the stage and making the great actors live again; but this ambitious purpose was abandoned. As they now stand these volumes comprise Mr. Winter's voluminous writings about the stage, and certainly they appear more vitally contributive to theatrical history than an academic treatise would have been. As vivid commentary on the celebrated actors of the past generation and those newer to fame this work surpasses any summary we've had. The style is that of the scholar in a talkative mood, and there is passage after passage of infinite deliciousness. A work of inestimable value. [Moffat, Yard and Company, New York. $10 net.

Our Irish Theatre, by Lady Gregory. Charming chapters constituting a real history of the Irish theater, yet retaining that essence of "talkiness" which gives a book a personality. Lady Gregory converses rather than writes; and, as those who know her will testify, she's a consummate artist at it. Of special interest are the chapters dealing with the Irish players' struggles and victories in this country. [G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York. $1.50 net.

The Drama To-Day, by Charlton Andrews. A compact discussion of the playwrights and plays with which the active modern theater concerns itself in this country, England and on the Continent. Distinctly adequate in conception and treatment. [J. B. Lippincott Company, Philadelphia. $1.50 net.

The Blindness of Virtue, by Cosmo Hamilton. A dramatic version of the play so successfully presented last year which teaches just how far innocence is a blessing and how it may mean simply ignorance and lack of protection. Joseph and His Brethren, by Louis N. Parker, has been successfully performed in New York and Boston during the last year, and its aim is to present the entire history of Joseph. Cambridge from Within, by Charles Tennyson. The grandson of Lord Tennyson describes student life in the venerable English university in a manner that's very human and appreciative. Philosophical and Religious

Our Eternity, by Maurice Maeterlinck; translated by Alexander Teixeira De Mattos. A new book by Maeterlinck is bound to arrest attention and be enjoyed by a large circle of readers. In this latest one he considers the question of death and the hereafter. In his usual independent way he approaches the subject with a keenly analytical glance at the possibilities regarding a hereafter. First, he says, there is the possibility of annihilation, but he dismisses this idea as unthinkable. What exists and has existed cannot cease to exist; it can only be transformed. Second, there is the idea of continuity with consciousness as it is in this life. This, too, he sets aside as lacking in a reasonable foundation. Third, there is continuity without consciousness, which he finds just as objectionable as annihilation. But last, there is the idea of continuity with modified consciousness, and this, he thinks, is the goal towards which all thought of immortality must lead. It is hardly necessary to add that Maeterlinck discusses the subject with a richness of illustration from the field of nature and a penetrative insight that make it a genuine pleasure to follow his thought. His idea of the Christian notions of immortality, however, is strangely confused and crude. No doubt the mediæval and Dantesque portraitures of the future life have been too inextricably associated in his mind with Christian teaching for him to appreciate that they are not of its essence and that the Christian notion is quite compatible with his own theory of a personal survival with modified consciousness. [Dodd, Mead and Company, New York. $1.50 net.]

Religion in Social Action, by Graham Taylor; with introduction by Jane Addams. Through his long constructive work for civic, social and church progress in Chicago and elsewhere through his years of intimate contact with people in all stations of life, Dr. Taylor is as well qualified as any man in this country to discuss the vital problems presented in this volume. An outline of his platform will give an idea of the book's scope: "What is the function of the church in the political sphere, in that of the family, the neighborhood, in industry? Can the church meet the demand of the world's growing consciousness and take the leadership in the work of social amelioration?" Truly this is one of the year's significant books. THE FITNESS OF THE ENVIRONMENT, by Lawrence J. Henderson. This work from a professor of biological chemistry in Harvard is a pioneer attempt to interpret "the biological significance of the properties of matter." It is evident to the author that the fitness of the environment is as necessary to life as adaptation of life itself is for its survival. In other words, the universe must be "biocentric," that is, destined to become the home of life. The author opposes this view to the vitalism of Bergson. He is a mechanist in biology, but postulates behind his mechanism a constant tendency working through the whole history of the cosmos—a tendency whose study the author says the scientist must leave to the philosopher, and, may we add, which the theologian must welcome also, as a recognition of the power with which he deals. [Macmillan Company, New York. $1.50 net.

ST. PAUL AND HIS FRIENDS, by E. Basil Redlich, subjects the documents to a study of the power of friendship as a factor in the life of Paul. The result is most interesting and profitable. We cannot entirely follow the author in the inferences which he draws from some small hints, as for example in his argument that John Mark deserted the two leaders on the first missionary journey because he was jealous for the authority of Barnabas, which Paul was gradually usurping, and because he was committed to the narrower policy of Peter, which it was evident Paul meant to abandon. This seems to us a large deduction from the record. But this very excess of imagination makes a vital book which never fails to be interesting. The appendix is of very large value. [Macmillan Company, New York. $1.75 net.

EVERYDAY LIFE IN THE HOLY LAND, by James Neil, is a book every reader of The Continent will be enormously interested in. It's a series of intimate, accurate and strangely interesting pictures of Palestine, painted with such detail that they become transcendently inspiring. The illustrations are very effective paintings by James Clark, assisted by J. Macpherson-Haye and S. B. Carlill under the direction of the author, and the volume has been given holiday attire with a beautiful binding. [Cassell and Company, New York.

THE WORLD SOUL, by H. Fielding-Hall. Under the guise of a brand-new solution of the riddle of the universe the author of this book reproduces a very ancient philosophy. The ultimate essence of things according to this new-old system is "matter endowed with soul." The world in all its complexity is a unit. In a broader sense it might be compared to an organism actuated by one living molding principle. Technically in earlier days this was called "hylozoism." There is much to be said in support of it and Mr. Fielding-Hall says it again with particular reference to Christianity and its Founder. In other words, he presents his explanation of the "world-soul" and "its plan" as the true interpretation of the thought of Jesus. That in the effort to support this thesis he necessarily expresses many novel ideas was inevitable. Whether these ideas shall be assigned any value or not, the book certainly raises and discusses some interesting problems. [Henry Holt and Company, New York. $2.75 net.

THE MESSAGE OF DAVID SWING TO HIS GENERATION, and LECTURES AND ORATIONS BY HENRY WARD BEECHER, edited by Newell Dwight Hillis. It is particularly appropriate that Dr. Hillis should select and arrange for publication the productions of these two great preachers to whose pulpits he succeeded. There is a striking likeness in the two volumes in that in each of them most of the addresses have as their subjects the great personalities in statesmanship, letters or the church. One of Swing's is on Beecher, and a memorial address on Swing by Dr. Hillis serves to introduce those of Swing himself. [Fleming H. Revell Company, New York. Each $1.20 net.

AN INTRODUCTION TO PHILOSOPHY, by Orlin Ottman Fletcher. In this compact volume Professor Fletcher of Furman University (South Carolina) endeavors to supply a felt need in the study of philosophy. The vagueness of the term philosophy gives the beginning student a considerable difficulty. To understand the nature of the problems touched upon and the history of their attempted solutions before launching forth into specialized study of the subject is of material help. And this help is precisely what Professor Fletcher aims to give. The book, however, assumes a considerable familiarity with the technical terminology of philosophy and could have been written in simpler terms. [Macmillan Company, New York. $1.60.

THREE LORDS OF DESTINY, by Samuel McChord Crothers. There are only three essays in this little volume and they've been given the simplest titles: Courage, Skill, Love. But they're pregnant with inspiration and are written with that literary charm with which Dr. Crothers is always identified. It constitutes the first volume in a lectureship course to be known as the "Raymond F. West Memorial Lectures on Immortality, Human Conduct and Human Destiny." [Houghton Mifflin Company, Boston. $1.

THE QUEST OF LIFE, by Charles Reynolds Brown, is a volume of fifteen splendid sermons by the dean of Yale Divinity School, who has recently been honored with the moderatorship of the National Council of the Congregational Church. Like all Dr. Brown's work, they are virile and practical, and deal with Christianity as life, in which respect they resemble the sermons of Phillips Brooks. [Pilgrim Press, Boston. $1.25 net.

Educational

THE WORK OF THE RURAL SCHOOL, by J. D. Eggleston and Robert W. Bruere. The rapidly increasing economic pressure of the past decade has confronted the American people with a new problem—the necessity of making our agricultural production keep pace with our increasing population, which it failed to do within 11 per cent from 1899 to 1909, as shown by the government census report. This achievement necessitates "the social and economic rehabilitation of our rural communities," and will have to be accomplished very largely through the medium of our country schools. Both Mr. Eggleston and Mr. Bruere are men of wide experience and observation, the former having been chief of field service in rural education, United States bureau of education. They have made a careful survey of the intellectual, moral and physical needs of country districts, observing the results obtained through capable experimentation in different sections under varied conditions. This book covers their field of study and contains many helpful suggestions to both the laity and profession interested in rural progress. [Harper and Brothers, New York. $1 net.

THE EDUCATIONAL RESOURCES OF VILLAGE AND RURAL COMMUNITIES, by Joseph K. Hart. "We must hitch education up with life," is the new slogan of the rural school workers, who recognize the increasing need of a broader and more practical education for village and country children. Mr. Hart deplores the narrow viewpoint of the person who "never thinks of education as being anything beyond those things which the school gives"; he realizes that our rural schools have not met the purpose for which they were designed and which must be met in the solution of the country's great economic problem. The fifteen articles in this volume deal with various phases of community development and have been contributed by men and women whose achievements in this field entitle their opinions to thoughtful consideration. THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

December 14, 1913—The Sin of Achan

Everyday View of the Lesson

By J. L. Scott

Lesson Text, Joshua 7. Golden Text, Numbers 32:23: Be sure your sin will find you out.

Life presents a series of violent contrasts. Ai follows Jericho in quick succession and the songs of victory are strangely blended with the cries of defeat. We absorb the air and spirit of the circumstances about us. But yesterday Joshua stood at the very center of victory. Jericho was in ruins and her walls lay leveled to the dust. Today the tide is reversed. His own army is in flight and he, their commander, lies upon the earth, crying, "Alas, O Lord Jehovah!" Joshua was stronger on the mountain than he was in the valley. His faith wavered with the change of the winds. There was in his cries an echo of reproach such as he had often heard in the desert, "Wherefore hast thou at all brought this people over the Jordan, to deliver us into the hands of the Amorites, to cause us to perish?" Joshua the human dominated, for the time being, Joshua the leader.

He Who Would Win Must Brace Himself for the Fight

The strongest are sometimes weak, and the leader of Israel was no exception. As a soldier he felt the humiliation of defeat. So sure had he been of victory that he had sent but 3,000 men against the city, only to see them retreat before the garrison without striking a blow. Something was wrong. Again he appealed unto God and God replied, "Get thee up; wherefore art thou thus fallen upon thy face? Israel hath sinned." There is no help in complaint. The man who rends his garment and sprinkles ashes upon his head at the first reverse in life is not likely to do much better when the second blow falls. He who would win must put himself in the attitude of war. "Get thee up; wherefore art thou thus fallen upon thy face?" So God says to the complainers everywhere. The fact that one lies with his face toward the ark adds no strength to his position. Many a one has approached a complainer hoping to touch through him the garment hem of the health inspiring Christ and found nothing but the black drapery of despair and heard nothing but the wail of defeat. Get thee up, my brother, and brush the dust from thy garments both for thine own sake and for the sake of others.

Israel had been defeated because it had sinned. Sin is a source of weakness. The wrongdoer may win, but the victory is never fully satisfactory to him. The consciousness of wrong lingers to harass his life. In our last lesson the spoils of Jericho were placed under the "ban." That is, they were reserved for God. No one could appropriate them to himself. It meant the actual annihilation of everything save that which went into the treasury of the Lord. Among the spoils was a Babylonish mantle, 200 shekels of silver and a wedge of gold. These had been stolen by Achan and hidden under his tent. The offense was more than an ordinary theft. It was an attack against the majesty of God. Looting is esteemed an offense in our own age, but in those days property that had been reserved for God was regarded as sacred. To touch it would be to touch God himself. But Achan suffered the penalty of his sin and God's wrath was turned away.

The Sin of Achan Had Its Origin in Covetousness

The sin of Achan, apart from local circumstances, may be regarded as illustrative of sin in general. It began in covetousness. "I coveted them and took them," was his confession. That is the logical sequence of every theft. The eighth commandment is only the tenth in another form. It is quite probable that Achan's conscience at first protested against the crime, but conscience proves a poor debater. Achan probably argued that while the garment might belong to another, in a mountain of spoils it would not be missed; further, he was entitled to some reward for his service. But conscience continued to say no—not so loudly as at first, but still it said no. But covetousness grew more urgent as conscience ceased to protest. The longer Achan looked at the garment the more beautiful it seemed. At last action followed desire and all was soon hidden under his tent. The secrecy was complete. The grass had closed upon his sin, he felt, and for it there was no resurrection possible.

Achan was mistaken. Our sins find us out and in the most unexpected ways. Not that every wrong becomes known in advance of the judgment, but stolen possessions are light sleepers. They awake at the touch of a shadow. Others might be ignorant of his deed, but Achan himself knew. His own conscience sat over that tent and refused to depart. From that hour he was a wretched man.

"No sharp revenge nor hell itself can find
A fiercer torment than a guilty mind."

The one friend that he had in all Israel had turned against him. He was a prisoner in the dungeon of his own heart.

Achan Unable to Save Himself from Results of His Sin

One can perhaps imagine, as the lot was being cast, the feelings of this wretched man. The walls were closing in upon him, as the fabled walls of Vengeance closed in upon their builder. No sin is ever restricted to the one sinner. Sin is like a pebble thrown into the water—it starts a circle that widens to the shore. Achan might bury the spoils beneath his tent, but he could not bury the results of that one act. He became a troubler and all Israel felt the disgrace.

One single false step will throw the procession out of line and a discordant note destroys the harmony of the sweetest music. Sin is discord. A great victory had been won in Israel. but not for Achan. To him it meant defeat. The sin of Achan was like all sin before and since—a protest against man and against God.

The Lesson Verse by Verse

By Hermon D. Jenkins

Analysis—The conquest of Canaan was a war, not a raid. The curse of every war is the impulse given to robbery. Sin defeats the best laid expeditions. More than one possible victory of late years has become a defeat through robbery. No lesson is more needed than this, that public office is a public trust.

It looked as though the conquest of this splendid country was to be a mere walkover. Jericho, its chief city, had fallen so completely that the story of its downfall had spread consternation among the native tribes.

But one condition of divine help was that the conquest should be for public good, not for private greed. It must never be said that this advance of Israel was a mere freebooters' raid, a cattle-lifting expedition in which all the low passions of human nature would have free play. There are rules of warfare as well as laws which are to be observed in times of peace. Once nations sanctioned the fitting out of privateers to prey upon the commerce of an enemy for personal enrichment. A public enemy was fair game for private robbery. In the same way bodies of banditti had license to kill and plunder as they chose, provided such killing and thieving was calculated to weaken the enemy. Now the international agreements bar out privateering by sea and indiscriminate plunder by "jayhawkers" and border ruffians on land.

Booty Not Turned Into Public Treasury Was to Be Destroyed

Bearing this in mind we can understand this story of Achan. This inroad was war, not highway robbery. Whatever was taken belonged to public use (ch. 6:24). The soldiers should not be inflamed by lust of plunder, one of the most difficult things to avoid in any successful campaign. We are not likely to forget that the soldiers of the six nations which marched to Peking for the deliverance and rescue of our diplomats and missionaries in 1900 scandalized the nation by their sales of loot after their return to their home. It was the command of Joshua, in accord with divine injunctions, that what could not be turned into the public treasury must not be stolen but must be destroyed.

Verse 2—Jericho had been so easily taken that the surrender of Ai, a much smaller and a poorly fortified town, was taken as a matter of course. The army rested at Gilgal while a detachment of 3,000 men was sent up through the foothills to the plateau of Ai, a city of 12,000 inhabitants (ch. 8:25), to gather it in. But instead of an easy victory the Israelites experienced a crushing defeat (vs. 4-5). The defeat utterly unnerved the Israelites and Joshua could not view the result with equanimity.

Verse 7—The strongest men have their moments of weakness and such a time came now to Joshua. The little army which he had sent forth in the morning with light hearts—as Napoleon III. said when his army set out for Gravelotte, Worth and Sedan—had straggled back at nightfall, faint, panic-stricken and ready to give up the attempt to take the country at all. Even Joshua doubted the wisdom of having crossed the Jordan. Perhaps every great soldier has passed through just such hours after some trifling but unexpected reverse.

Verse 8—The worst that Joshua dreaded was the effect upon his enemies. They would immediately take courage to resist Israel's advance.

Verse 9—As a matter of fact, if the native races, as we may call them, though they were themselves invaders, should get together to withstand Israel, Israel had no show for conquest. Israel must fight on the offensive. The Canaanites need only defend, and the result at Ai showed that with a reasonable amount of pluck they could successfully defend their cities and discomfit their foes.

Not the Army of Ai but Sin Brought Defeat

Verse 10—If a man must die it is worth while to die standing. When a great soldier loses his grip he becomes less than nothing. The optimist turned pessimist sinks down like lead. When a man contending for the faith loses some little skirmish he shouts that "everything is lost" and becomes a burden instead of a buttress.

Verse 11—When the advance of the church is turned into a defeat the church is likely to blame providence. But God says if you would see the cause look into your own heart. Nothing can defeat the church but sin.

Verse 12—It is more than possible that Achan had accomplices in his attempt to appropriate part of the spoils to his own use. We have here a lesson needed today, when all sorts of subterfuges are resorted to in order to get something for nothing. The Israelites needed a severe lesson then and there, otherwise their government might become corrupt as that of other Eastern states.

Discipline Imposed Upon Israel a Salutary Thing for Any Army

Verse 13—It was said at the time the French were defeated in 1870 that the French army was unfitted for active service because of the peculations of the men who were to have provided the army with ammunition and commissary stores. When the war broke out between Turkey and the Balkan states, Turkey had a navy in the waters of the Bosporus not one ship of which, it was said, could make a voyage. The navy had been financially scuttled by its own officers. According to histories (written by men taken prisoners in our civil war) certain noncommissioned officers intrusted with the issuing of rations to the prisoners stole upwards of 10,000 rations of food in a single prison camp and 5,000 pairs of shoes and sold them all. Had our armies been subjected to some such discipline as was imposed upon Israel it might have been better for all concerned.

Verses 14-15—So deep an impression did the penalty make upon the minds of the people that we hear no more of such acts as that of Achan. Whether the same punishment was visited upon his family is uncertain from the record, but if so we may believe that they were involved with the father in an equal guilt, and indeed, from the character of the booty, it is probable they incited as well as shared it. War is a diabolic schoolmaster and its lessons must be deeply cut.

DEVOTIONAL SERVICE

BY EDWARD ARTHUR WICHER

Week Beginning December 7, 1913

TOPIC—The lost sheep. Matthew 18:12-13.

This parable occurs in two entirely different settings, here and in Luke 15:3-7. The purpose that prompts it is different in the two contexts. In the latter it is spoken in reference to the complaint of the Pharisees and scribes about Jesus being so much in the company of publicans and sinners. They objected to Jesus on the ground that he kept bad company. He received sinners wherever he tarried for a day; and—still more grievous offense—he went into their houses and ate at their tables, thus making himself their familiar friend.

Jesus was both pure and genial, and thus he could save sinners. If he had been pure only, his purity would indeed have rebuked their sins, but they would have fled from his holy gaze. They would have prayed to be hidden from the scorching light of his resentment. If he had been genial only, his geniality would have attracted them, and brought a balm for their wounded spirits. But he would not have saved them from themselves. The Pharisee at his best was only pure, ceremonially pure, and he believed that Jesus was only genial. What he did not understand was that Jesus was both pure and genial. Thus the Pharisee never could help the publican and sinner; while Jesus could save them to the uttermost.

They objected to the kind of society Jesus kept, and Jesus answered them: "This is a very simple matter. You understand the principle in the conduct of everyday affairs. If any man of you have a hundred sheep and lose one, he leaves the ninety-nine safe in the fold and goes away out into the wilderness to seek the one, and he continues his search until he finds it. Now you know why I receive sinners and eat with them." The parable was clear. But inasmuch as those Pharisees did not have the Shepherd's heart they still failed to understand his reason.

Perhaps Jesus used the parable of the shepherd frequently in his discourses; for many of his most beautiful symbols were drawn from the pastoral life. He loved to think of himself as a shepherd. In another aspect he also thought of himself as the door of the sheepfold. And deep in his own knowledge of himself he was the Lamb of God. He felt an affinity with the lambs, and with the little children who were helpless as the lambs.

In the setting of the parable in Matthew Jesus has been speaking of the little children, and the awfulness of the guilt of the man who should so deal with one of those innocent little beings as to lead him into sin. Then he goes on to speak of the weak ones in the kingdom, who are but as children in their inability to meet the world and resist evil. Then the Master returns to the children, whom he tenderly refers to as "little ones," and whose guardian angels, he says, do always behold the face of his Father in heaven. The meaning of the parable then is that God cares for children and childlike believers even as a shepherd cares for his sheep.

Perhaps it seems to us that one sheep out of a herd of a hundred is not very important. The ninety-nine others will be enough to occupy the time and satisfy the affections of the shepherd. But they are not enough. While one sheep is lost the heart of the shepherd is consumed with anxiety on its sole behalf. For the present he thinks nothing about the ninety-nine, but gives himself up wholly to the recovery of the one.

This note of individualism is among the most precious sounded by the Saviour. For the solitary man, amid the crowds of men, often feels as if he were nothing. The waves of humanity surge in around him out of a boundless sea. He is but a moment in the eternal silence. He is a vapor. God may be concerned with the crowds or the prominent personalities in the crowds, but he can scarcely be concerned with one wandered, insignificant, common man. It is just he for whom Christ is concerned. It is just he for whom the shepherd is leaving the light and warmth of the shelter by the sheepfold in order that he may find him and bring him home again.

The wandering sheep was lost both to himself and to his shepherd. For himself, he was doomed to perish in the darkness and fierceness of the mountains. As for the shepherd, he could not be happy in the sight of the ninety-nine safe sheep while that one poor lamb was in peril in the wilds.

Nothing is said about the hardships of the shepherd as he pursued his sheep into the night. Nothing is said about his oft-repeated cry as he toiled up the heights and crossed the jagged rocks in the depths of the mountain gorges. Nothing is said of his wounded hands and feet and side. When he suffered, he suffered alone.

But something is said about his joy in the recovery of his sheep. He utters no word of reproach for the wandering one; he simply picks it up and carries it home in his bosom. But he rejoices exultingly over the happy ending of his quest.

It is a terrible thing for the church of Christ when the shepherd's heart fails from out the shepherd. Suppose that he should convince himself that it is his duty to stay by the fold to feed his ninety-nine while he suffers the one to wander. This may be a safe way, but it is not Jesus' way. If ever there was a peril to be faced in the path of duty, Christ was there. And wandered sheep were never found again unless the shepherd made his sacrifice of pain and blood.

Above all, it is terrible to cause, either by our neglect or misconduct, the children to wander away from the good Shepherd's fold.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S SERVICE

COMMENTS IN BRIEF BY WILLIAM T. ELLIS

December 14, 1913

THE NAMES NOT BORN TO DIE

TOPIC—Lessons from the men and women of the Bible. Hebrews 11:1-40.

Every Pennsylvania soldier who was in the battle of Gettysburg has his name inscribed in bronze on the great state monument on the battlefield. Every person who lives in Holy Writ has a deathless fame. Many of the conquerors of empires are not so well known as humble men and women who appear in the pages of this immortal volume. And every life therein recorded has its message for us in this day and time.

Back in the beginning we find Abel standing as the exponent of spiritual worship. He personifies man's need of God and man's approach to God. He gave of his best on the altar of heaven; and the incense of that offering has been fragrant through the ages since.

Every life of faith is a signpost to travelers on the world's highway.

Very human are the Bible characters, and therein vastly different from the misty heroes of mythology. That these men were "bone of our bone, flesh of our flesh," and yet honored friends of God, heartens us to hope that, despite our stumblings and shortcomings, we may be of use in the service of our Lord.

The great come-outer was Abraham. He dared give up for God. He surrendered all in obedience to a spiritual vision. To him the unseen was more real than the material. Because he dared leave Ur of the Chaldees and fertile Haran he became the father of the faithful, and the friend of God. To contemplate Abraham is to have one's sense of spiritual values quickened. Abraham is still leading souls from the Ur of material advantage to the Canaan of fellowship with the Father.

Some of us are, like Isaac, only little links between greater lives than our own. But it is a great thing to pass on the faith from a great father like Abraham to a great son like Jacob.

The day's call for leadership in Christian service carries us back to thoughts of the Jewish foundling who became an Egyptian aristocrat and then gave up all in order to serve his own people. Moses stands for equipment, renunciation, obedience to a call, and patient service of a thoughtless people. To choose a leadership is to choose to suffer affliction. It accepts ingratitude and reviling—but it still moves on toward better things.

All like adventure and heroism. There are few characters in history which fill out the portrait of a hero more fully than Caleb, the stouthearted spy in youth and the valiant conqueror in old age. "Be strong and of good courage" rings from every line of that biography.

Hannah sought no career except that of a mother, and she bore her trouble to the refuge of women through all ages, the Father of us all. Like a million mothers, she prevailed through prayer. Samuel became the expression of her personality, her great gift to God and the nation. The tender solicitude of this godly mother points to every woman the divinest expression of woman's life.

The man who has the insight to know his own work, and the courage to resist all calls to turn aside from it, is a modern Nehemiah.

Saul had largeness of body but not largeness of soul. His height and his handsomeness did not keep him from being a failure as a king and as a man.

Out of his boyish devotion, his midlife valor and his old-age sin David wrote songs which are today the best vocalization of humanity's experiences. Great David! Poor David! What a magnificent success—and failure—he was! But at last his life turned to God, as a wandering pigeon to its nest. That in all of life's experiences we may still find God is the great lesson of this sweet singer of Israel.

A man "with the bark on," a wilderness dweller, a rugged, fearless fierce-speaking prophet of the highest truth he had learned—such was Elijah. But a woman scared him and he fled and cried for death. Yes, the great man had moods and the prophet is oftener discouraged than the world suspects. Let us be considerate of these bearers of God's message, but by no means coddle them. The wilderness helps make the prophet.

Versatility is lauded nowadays, and when the quality is being praised do not forget to cite Paul, the Tarsus Jew, as a conspicuous instance of one who possessed it. Learned ecclesiastical lawyer; daring defender of the old faith, equally zealous of the new, when he had once seen it in its true light; indefatigable traveler; a comrade and teacher of the plain folk; a journeyman tentmaker; a keen debater and eloquent lawyer; a profound philosopher; an immortal writer, and, above all, a humble saint and dear friend of Jesus Christ—such was this one man whose impress upon humanity is today greater than that of Napoleon or the Cæsars.

The theme of Bible characters is almost endless, calling for a library of volumes. There were twelve who kept near the person of Jesus; the ministering women, the evangelists and writers, like Mark and Luke; the young men, like Timothy and Titus; the characters who appear for an instant in the gospel story, like Nicodemus and Joseph of Arimathea and Cyrus of Cyrene. But most of all, the thought returns to Him who is the first and the last. He is the summation in himself of all the holy lives and great endeavors and true words of the inspired book. To know him is not merely an inspiration—it is life.

MISSIONARY WORK

Real Men Are Needed for Alaska

Secretary Thompson announces to the church that the Board of Home Missions has resolved to put more money and more force into its Alaska work hereafter, being convinced that the immediate future of that territory is bound to involve vast developments with which the church must use extraordinary endeavors to keep abreast. Already the board has proposed to establish two new missions at strategic points in the long Alaskan "cup handle" which reaches down the Pacific coast toward Vancouver. One of these missions is to minister to the white population and the other is to be conducted for special service to the natives.

This southerly coast region is included in the bounds of the Presbytery of Alaska. The great main body of the territory farther north forms the Presbytery of Yukon. Here the demands for enlarged Christian service are almost beyond count. As winter was closing in, the discovery of gold was announced at two undeveloped points in the interior of the country, and those who know the ways of the Alaskan pioneer foresee a great stampede to these new camps as soon as spring returns. For both these prospective cities the Board of Home Missions is determined that Presbyterianism shall keep up the record which it has maintained ever since the Klondike was opened in 1898—the record of sending in with every rush of gold miners a virile, positive Christian minister to remind the pioneers that there is something better than gold for every man to seek.

Meanwhile earnest consideration is being given to an elaborate plan for a coast mission to fishermen which will adopt the methods and, it is hoped, parallel the success of Dr. Grenfell's great work in Labrador. The location indicated for the experiment is Bristol bay, where nearly 2,000 white fishermen have their headquarters during the summer season and where almost a thousand natives live the year round. This work ought obviously to be not only evangelical but medical and probably to a considerable extent industrial. It will require for its equipment a first-class hospital, a strong power boat for summer use and an outfit of dogs and sleds for winter travel.

Beyond this it goes without saying that other opportunities not less pressing are sure to attend the increasing business development of the territory. Two government railroads are soon to be opened up, along which not only communities of miners but communities of farmers also will early be established. The coal fields in the long run will be more densely populated than the gold fields and the speedy establishment of churches in these localities will, from any conscientious religious viewpoint, be imperative.

The board will of course require additional funds for these bold departures, but in the initial stage of projection there is very much less concern for the money than for the men to do the work. Opening up such undertakings must make a large draft on the very best quality of ministerial leadership that the church can afford. Not physical conditions only, but social conditions as well, make Alaska impossible for all but the hardiest, most courageous and most devoted ministers. The virility of the pioneer life of all these new regions will respect nothing but the flower of manliness and an oaken strength of sincerity in men who represent the gospel. So the board is keenly anxious to discover available material of this type and will gladly hear from volunteers who believe that they can endure the rigorous tests which it means to apply before it commissions anyone for any part of Alaska.

Besides the two new missions already mentioned in the Presbytery of Alaska there are three or four other churches in the same region calling loudly for pastors. The Bristol bay mission will require both a minister and a physician and the old mission at Point Barrow on the Arctic coast, the most northerly and doubtless the most lonesome missionary station on the American continent, can be filled only by a man who is both a minister and a physician. Qualified persons who feel any sense of call to any of these tasks may apply for information to Dr. S. Hall Young, at 156 Fifth avenue, New York, where Dr. Young is now established as the board's special superintendent for Alaskan work. It is very largely under the pressure of his urgent presentation of Alaska's needs that the advance policy here outlined has been so favorably dealt with in the board's recent counsels.

Another Chance to Help Korea

The Korean conspiracy case is ended as far as the government of Korea is concerned. Out of the 123 who were at first convicted, all but six have been acquitted and these six are now serving their terms. The larger number of arrests were among the Presbyterians.

In defense of these poor fellow Christians in Korea missionaries were compelled to expend $4,823.29. The board at New York has carefully audited these accounts and believes that every dollar was most economically used and for the best interests of the cause. Without the aid thus furnished it is very doubtful whether any of the accused would have escaped conviction.

This large sum comes as an extra appropriation on the part of the board. Any friends who are interested in Korea and who would like to contribute should send their gifts to Dwight H. Day, treasurer, 156 Fifth avenue, New York, stating that the money is to be applied toward meeting the expenses connected with the defense of the Koreans accused of conspiracy against the Japanese government.

Cast Out Idols; Wait for Christ

A Chinese member of the mission church at Cheefoo, China, recently left that city to return to his old home in the western part of Shantung province. On his arrival among his former neighbors he was instant in season and out of season in telling the cause of the joy which had come to his life and in proclaiming Christ among the people. The interest aroused in the village was so keen that the citizens speedily sent a message to Chefoo requesting that some preacher be sent to explain the way of Christ to them more fully. Pastor Wen was accordingly dispatched to the aid of his zealous parishioner and like Barnabas coming to Antioch had abundant occasion to thank God for what he found. The principal men of the village, though they had not definitely accepted the gospel, had all renounced their idols and had turned the temples into schoolhouses and the temple grounds into parks. The young priests had been ordered out of town and told to go and earn their own living, while the old priests were informed that they might remain in the temples if they were willing to work. So these old temple servitors are now sweeping and dusting and ringing the temple bells to call the children to school.

The idols were all disposed of in the easiest way to get rid of them. Those made of mud were thrown out into the gulleys, those made of wood were burned and those made of metal were bricked around so that they would be invisible. When the summer came on and a severe drought set in there were some signs of a reaction because the conservatives of the town said the drought was a punishment for the way the city had treated the idols. But before these murmurs had become acute a heavy rain fell and the last peril of restoration of idolatry disappeared.

Pastor Wen during his brief stay in the place talked with multitudes and baptized seven whom he regarded as true converts. But the mission could not spare a permanent worker to preach to this infant church and the mission leaders are seriously concerned lest the remarkable opportunity in this idol-repudiating town shall disappear before any constructive work has been accomplished.

Persia's Self-Supporting Boys' School

The sequel to the story that came a year or two ago from Kermanshah of the request from leading men of Dolatabad for a boys' school under missionary direction, for the support of which they paid liberally in advance, comes in this word from Rev. George F. Zoeckler of Hamadan: "The enrollment was 103, with an average attendance of 85, which meant an increase also in the income. There has been some opposition to the school on the part of fanatical mollahs, but all their attacks have had the opposite effect, and aside from the occasional remark that the Koran should be taught in the school, all opposition has died down. The roll included ten princes, five sayyids, four sons of the ulema and over fifty sons of the gentry; there were also two Armenians and four Jews. The boys have made remarkable progress, as was shown in the public examination, when they were examined in certain studies by outsiders, one of the examiners being a former pupil in the Teheran school. The exhibition made a marked impression on the audience, the result being an increase in attendance."

A Seedling School in Persia

Writing from that outpost of eastern Persia, Kermanshad, Mrs. F. M. Stead, M. D., tells of the school begun in her home: "There ought to be a school here, for there is not even an ordinarily good native school in all this part of the country. It is seven days' journey to our school in Dolatabad, and six days to the one in Hamadan, and there is nothing that by the greatest stretch of magnanimity could be called a school anywhere nearer. And yet these Kurdish children are very bright. It is a marvel what progress these few that we have gathered here have made in one month. Yes, we took our orphans right into the family circle. Our family circle is not very big and there is plenty of room for them in the house and in the dining room. When we sit down to meals they have their tablecloth spread on the floor, according to the custom of the country, and are served from our table. It has been hard when there are so many fatherless children, owing to the large number of men killed in the wars of the last two years, to feel that we could not do more."

Missionary Brevities

—A recent visitor to Chai Ryung, Korea, says that although there are many heathen still living there, the Christian sentiment is so strong that on the Sabbath the business streets are more quiet than in towns he has visited in Texas and in California.

—From 10,000 to 15,000 patients a month crowd the Presbyterian hospital at Chai Ryung, Korea, where there is but one American doctor, Dr. Whiting, with two Korean assistants. This medical work started five or six years ago in native Karean houses where for a long time the only operating room was the mud floor of the house. The clinic each morning is opened by a prayer service. Dr. Whiting's skill is attested by a large lacquered sign given by a grateful Chinaman who had been seriously stabbed by robbers.

Board Notes and Announcements

—The Friday morning leader at the Board of the Northwest, Chicago, was Mrs. Noble C. King of Oak Park Second church, at whose request Mrs. George Cuthbertson of that church gave the Bible thought from the first chapter of Jeremiah, showing that message to be to this nation as truly as to Israel. Mrs. J. F. Garvin of Santiago spoke of the Chileans in a spirit that proves why she has spent twenty-nine years in devoted service there. She called the Chileans "the finest Spanish-speaking people in the world." She told of the men of Mr. McLean's training classes, who at the close of a hard day's work at carpenter's bench or elsewere meet for Bible study that they may be prepared to lead meetings in needy places; also of the zeal and faithfulness of the women. Letters from Mrs. Williams of Bucaramanga were followed by prayer for Colombia and Chile.

—The receipts of the Board of the Northwest for the first eight months of the current year are $56,942. This is an increase of $16,830 to date over the gifts of last year. The sum of $30,019 has been for China propaganda to apply on the pledge of $75,000. There was also a gift of $5,000 for Shantung University. Including this the board will raise $80,000 for China by March 15, 1915.

The Open Hearth

[Writers of letters to The Open Hearth are reminded that excessive length of their contributions operates to shut out other participants in current discussions. Three hundred words is an acceptable maximum. Communications of greater length will be cut down, or will be returned if marked "in full or not at all."]

"The Folly of Exaggeration"

Permit me a word with reference to what Dr. D. C. Milner had to say on "the folly of exaggeration." Certainly "our Roman Catholic fellow citizens" should be treated with all fairness. For one I feel that they deserve well for their heroic sacrifice of life and treasure in our country's hours of need, and their many other good and worthy deeds. I don't believe that the rank and file of Roman Catholics are thinking about any mischief for the United States. So far as Dr. Milner's article has to do with them we all can and should say a hearty amen.

I do not understand that The Continent or any newspaper attacks Roman Catholics as such. It is the Roman Church and a secret society of Roman Catholics that is the object of the attacks the writer had in mind. Now as only about one Roman Catholic in forty-three belongs to this order it will be seen that not Roman Catholics but a certain small body of men who belong to the Roman Church is meant, unless the Roman hierarchy is also attacked. I do not charge this secret society with anything, neither do I know what its secret aims are. Only those who have taken its oaths and to whom its secrets have been disclosed can know. Now how does anyone not an oath-bound member of such an order know so much about what these men have bound themselves together to do or not to do? Let us be generous enough to hope that no preposterous and hell-born schemes have entered into their thoughts even. But such things have been attempted by the Roman Church many a time before. Someone may have broken his oath of secrecy and told the truth.

I believe Dr. Milner's advantages in this whole matter are no better than mine. Just why this secret society? Why must its members be "good" Roman Catholics? Because "good" Roman Catholics can be trusted with secret aims and will yield unquestioned obedience to orders. JOSEPH GASTON.

Wants the Names of Writers

May I have space for a word in the Open Hearth? I have noticed sometimes in this column articles signed with a pseudonym, and generally this is the case when the writer has something to say that is of the nature of adverse criticism or "knocking." Would it not be a good practice to introduce to print only those articles that bear the name of the writer? For one, I know that the fictitious name invariably discounts the article from the start, whether I agree with the sentiments or not. If anyone must say what is in the nature of a criticism let him say it, but say it in such terms that he will not be unwilling to have it in print over his name. Is the barbed arrow of criticism less piercing because shot from an unknown bow? Or is it "safer" to shoot from this literary ambush? J. P. LEYENBERGER.

Florida Church Welcomes Visitors

I read The Continent with constant delight—the letters from the many town and cities, with the pleasing notes and comments—but I have waited in vain for some mention of Punta Gorda. Punta Gorda is in Florida, twenty miles from the Gulf of Mexico. Her climate is so healthful that doctors have to go to farming to make a living. The people are cosmopolitan, in that they come from everywhere, mostly from "the North," which down here means anywhere on the continent between Alabama and the north pole. They are wideawake, intelligent, hospitable, substantial, consequently many are Presbyterians, and ours is the leading church. We have a commodious house of worship centrally located.

During the winter visitors flock to the city as doves to their windows. Some of these are Christians; some are not. Some bring their religion with them, others leave it at home or lose it on the way. One wishes the northern pastor would wind his migrating members up, so that they would not run down for at least three months. The Presbyterian church has a hearty welcome for all who come. She invites them to make her house of worship theirs, her pastor their pastor. J. H. A.

"Rebellious" Not His Adjective

In his letter in The Continent Sept. 18, Rev. K. L. Bishara is laboring under a wrong impression. I did not apply the adjective "rebellious" to the class of 1910 of Princeton Seminary; I only quoted the words of one who did. The heading under which the letter appeared was placed there by the editor.

F. Z. BROWNE.

A Hint for Christmas

Many Young Men's Christian Associations, churches and private individuals make hundreds of young men in the cities of the country feel at home on Christmas day by inviting them to dinner in congenial surroundings. There are few more homesick days on the calendar than Christmas in a strange city, especially when dinner must be eaten alone in a restaurant. Many families take pleasure in hunting out strange young men and inviting them to join the home circle for that holiday.

HOW THE BOY SCOUT MOVEMENT GROWS

The advantages of becoming a Boy Scout have been brought to the attention of 600,000 boys who are insured in the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company of New York. The company has offered three premiums to boys for service in the scout organization. An effort is being made to have the Western Union and Postal Telegraph companies give copies of the handbook for boys to their messengers that they may become interested in the Boy Scout movement.—Jacob Riis in a recent article on Boy Scouts in The Outlook tells some interesting incidents relating to the growth of the scout movement which in three years has organized an army of 300,000 boys.

Scout Activities—A Boy Scout troop attached to the Third church of Trenton, N. J., was recently installed and the Scout oath administered. —The moving picture film, "The Making of a Scout," was recently shown in Irvington church, Indianapolis, Ind., under the auspices of the scouts of that church.

"A shining countenance" is produced by ordinary soaps.

The use of Pears' reflects beauty and refinement. Pears' leaves the skin soft, white and natural.

"The Inside of the Cup"

The inside of the cup is not driving many ministers into the panic of unbelief. Most men in the ministry are willing and eager to drink the cup of which their Lord drank. They believe in His absolute deity in perfect humanity and all that flows therefrom. They are "not ashamed of the Gospel of Christ"!

It is not "the inside of the cup" but the dregs at the bottom of the cup that cause the minister distress. The bitterest dregs of all are the precipitate of the knowledge of an old age unprovided for or of widow and orphan who will be left to drink the cup alone.

The Lord is giving grace to His disabled servants to drink of the cup which He drank. The church is also helping to remove the bitter dregs by providing adequately for the days of old age and disability.

Do you want to share the "cup of fellowship" with the veterans of the church?

THE FIELD OF CHRISTIAN EFFORT

FORTY VOLUNTEER FOR FOREIGN WORK

The China campaign in St. Louis stirred the city for foreign missions as never before. Through the foreign missions committee of presbytery plans were made for reaching all of the churches, women's societies and the Sabbath schools and when the workers came fourteen strong the field was ready. The team included Doctors Halsey, Fulton, Garrill, Luce, Bradt, Coile, Lingle, Tappan, Reherd, Mills, King, Locke and Killie.

The meeting on Sunday afternoon at Washington and Compton Avenue church, called for the special purpose of reaching the young people, was memorable. Doctors Halsey, Fulton and Locke presented in most forceful language the importance of the work in China and the crying need for helpers. Then Dr. F. W. Russell, chairman of the foreign mission committee of presbytery, made an appeal for volunteers. Slowly one and another began to arise until at length forty young women and men were on their feet. They all came to the front and then each signed a declaration: "It is my purpose, if God permit, to become a foreign missionary."

PRIZES AT COUNTRY LIFE CONFERENCE

One of the most successful of the many recent conferences in small towns combining religion and agriculture was that held Nov. 13 and 14 at Raymond, Neb. A year ago, shortly after the coming of Rev. J. C. Wilson as pastor, the first conference was held. Later in the winter an institute was formed with many farmers as members, which met every two months. Subjects of health, sanitation and better farming were discussed and a prize was offered for cleaning the town of tin cans. This fall in connection with the conference prizes were offered in eight departments after the model of a miniature county fair. Addresses were made by Dr. L. D. Young of Beatrice and other pastors. The state university furnished lecturers on agricultural subjects. The attendance was large.

THREE SUGGESTIVE ITEMS

Six Year Old Church Endowed—The church of Lemmon, S. D., organized among homesteaders six years ago and with only three members, has not only a house of worship and a manse, but also an endowment assuring the minister, Rev. Martin Hyink, a living salary. Recently under the leadership of Sunday School Missionary W. C. Gilbert, with headquarters there, a very successful Sunday school convention and institute was held.

First Church in Twenty Years — The new church at Double Springs, Tenn., was dedicated recently. W. A. Provine, D. D., superintendent of Sunday school work, delivered the sermon. He was assisted by the pastor, Rev. B. V. Riddle, Rev. J. H. Miller, Rev. W. W. Baxter and Rev. S. K. Philips. This church is the result of earnest, consecrated work done in this section by Sabbath School Missionary Rev. W. W. Baxter. This is the first church ever built in the town, which is over twenty years old.

A Christmas Suggestion—Copies of the gospel of John in place of the usual Christmas cards is the suggestion for gifts which Dr. Robert Watson of Cincinnati, Ohio, is making to members of his congregation.

FOUR CHURCHES IN COMMUNION

Rev. William M. Case

At the close of a "campaign for clean living" conducted recently in Caldwell, Idaho, by Rev. H. H. Rottmann, field secretary for the Christian Endeavorers, a singular union communion service was held. An elder in the Church of the Disciples, A. F. Hart, suggested to his pastor, D. B. Titus, that a fitting expression of the united spirit among the churches could be given in a union communion service at the close of Mr. Rottmann's address the last Sunday of the campaign. The pastors of the four participating churches agreed with alacrity, as did also their leading members. The auditorium of the First Methodist church was filled with worshipers. Rev. W. M. Case as dean of the resident ministers and pastor of the Presbyterian church was asked by his brethren to conduct the service. This he did, using the ritual of the Book of Common Worship of his church. He was assisted in the celebration by Messrs. Buckey, Titus and Varney—pastors of the local Methodist, Disciples and Baptist churches respectively. The elements were distributed by two laymen from each of the four churches. Mr. Varney declared that so far as he knew he was the first Baptist pastor in the United States to have a distinct part in such a service and to be assisted by two of his deacons.

Y. W. C. A. GETS NEW CONFERENCE SITE

The latest great achievement of the national Y. W. C. A. is the new Asilomar conference grounds on the upper edge of Monterey bay at Pacific Grove, Cal. It is the first conference site owned by the Y. W. C. A. and the thirty acres which it occupies was the gift of the Pacific Coast Improvement Company. Much of the equipment was presented by Mrs. Phœbe Hearst, who last year entertained the Pacific coast conference. Ten permanent tent houses and a beautiful stone administration building have been erected. The grounds will be open from March 1 to Oct. 1 next year and many organizations have already booked conferences to be held there.

EXAMPLES THAT STIMULATE TO DOING

Men often need the example of a good piece of work well done by someone somewhere else to stimulate them to make the most of their present opportunity. You can help another thus to do his best work by letting him know about a successful plan worked in some church which has come under your notice. The Continent's news department serves as a clearing house, grouping the ideas and dressing them for easy assimilation. You can help the whole church in this manner at the cost of a few minutes' time and a postage stamp.

CHRISTIANS HAVE EFFICIENCY CONGRESS

A "church efficiency congress" held in the Christian church of Davenport, Iowa, Nov. 16-23 for members of that denomination over the central West attracted the attention of many in that city as well as in Rock Island and Moline. Fifty specialists were employed as instructors and speakers, including, besides people nationally prominent in their own denomination, such names as W. C. Pearce of Chicago and Mrs. Mary Foster Bryner.

Each week day was divided into six periods. The first two were devoted to conferences, sixteen going on at once in as many different rooms and on as many different subjects. At 11 a. m. was a popular lecture in the auditorium followed by discussion. Two more conference periods each with its sixteen groups in the afternoon and a mass meeting at night completed the program for a day. Every phase of Sunday school work was studied in these groups from the cradle roll through all the grades to the home department, including music, evangelism, teacher training, temperance, social service, organized classes and rural work.

SEVERAL SERMON SUBJECTS

Washington—Rev. R. N. Milligan, Immanuel church, Tacoma: "Things Fundamental."

Oregon—Dr. John H. Boyd, First church, Portland: "The Attitude of the Modern Mind Toward the Meaning of Salvation."

Kansas—Dr. S. S. Estey, First church, Topeka: "The Inside of the Cup; or, Sham in the Church"; "Eucken's Message to Our Age; or, the Supremacy of Spirit"; "Crowds; or, Great Life Thoughts."

WOMEN HELP THE CHURCH

Illinois—Mrs. W. B. Wolf has given a pipe organ to cost at least $6,000 to Monmouth, Ill., church, Dr. W. R. King pastor. Announcement of this gift was made recently.

Wisconsin—The church fair held by the women of Perseverance church, Milwaukee, the same week as the wedding in the White House had among other articles for sale "Sayre taffy," "Jessie Wilson angel food," "honeymoon dates."

WIFE WON
Husband Finally Convinced

Some people are wise enough to try new foods and beverages and then generous enough to give others the benefit of their experience. A wife writes:

"No slave in chains, it seemed to me, was more helpless than I, a coffee captive. Yet there were innumerable warnings — waking from a troubled sleep with a feeling of suffocation, at times dizzy and out of breath, attacks of palpitation of the heart that frightened me.

(Tea is just as injurious as coffee because it contains caffeine, the same drug found in coffee.)

"At last my nervous system was so disarranged that my physician ordered 'no more coffee.' I capitulated.

"Determined to give Postum a fair trial, I prepared it according to directions on the package, obtaining a dark brown liquid with a rich snappy flavor similar to coffee. When cream and sugar were added, it was not only good but delicious.

"Noting its beneficial effects in me the rest of the family adopted it—all except my husband, who would not admit that coffee hurt him. Several weeks elapsed during which I drank Postum two or three times a day, when to my surprise my husband said: 'I have decided to drink Postum. Your improvement is so apparent—you have such fine color—that I propose to give credit where credit is due.' And now we are coffee slaves no longer."

Name given by Postum Company, Battle Creek, Mich. Read "The Road to Wellville," in packages.

Postum now comes in two forms:

Regular Postum—must be boiled.

Instant Postum is soluble powder. A teaspoonful dissolves quickly in a cup of hot water and, with cream and sugar, makes a delicious beverage instantly. Grocers sell both kinds.

"There's a Reason" for Postum.

MANY PRESBYTERIANS GIVE TO FUND

Total of Givers in New York Campaign Was 17,244—Dan Crawford Asks for Hospital—Booth Brothers Meet.

NEW YORK—As stated elsewhere in this issue the largest givers to the $4,000,000 Christian Association fund were widely known Presbyterians, Cleveland H. Dodge and his sister, Miss Grace Dodge, of Riverdale church in Bronx borough. Mrs. Helen Gould Shepard, Mrs. D. Willis James, Mrs. Andrew Carnegie, Mrs. Russell Sage, William D. Sloane, John Sloane and William Sloane were other large Presbyterian givers. The total number of subscribers to the $4,052,501 was 17,244.

Dan Crawford's Farewell—Dan Crawford, the African missionary, addressed a large audience in Central branch of the Y. M. C. A. in Brooklyn Nov. 23. In concluding he said: "I am working for a $10,000 hospital for Africa. During the past twenty-three years I have never asked Brooklyn for a dollar. But before I reach 'Frisco I hope to have that money. Good-by, Brooklynites. I am on my way to Africa again. Never more will I see you all. Good-by. God bless you all."

Siloam Relays Corner Stone—Siloam church in Brooklyn, Rev. W. A. Alexander pastor, relaid its corner stone Nov. 23. The church was organized Nov. 30, 1850, on a site in Cranberry street. This was its location until 1904, when the city condemned it along with other property for the new Manhattan bridge. The church purchased a location in Lafayette avenue and is now free from debt. At the morning service Nov. 30 the mortgage was burned. Those who took part in the corner stone relaying were Dr. John H. Kerr and Dr. R. H. Carson. Dr. Kerr said that Siloam was the first church in presbytery to free itself from debt.

Church of Covenant Keeps Anniversary—The Church of the Covenant, affiliated with Brick church, celebrated its twentieth anniversary last Sunday. Rev. Theodore F. Savage, pastor of the sister affiliated chapel, Christ church, took part in the morning service. In the evening Dr. William P. Merrill, pastor of Brick church, preached. Dr. G. S. Webster is pastor.

Booth Brothers Meet—During the recent visit of General Bramwell Booth to New York the Salvation Army commander and his brother, Ballington Booth, met for only the second time since the latter deserted the army and organized the Volunteers of America seventeen years ago. The interview was entirely personal and had nothing to do with the consolidation of the two movements. General Booth said in one of his addresses that he felt there was room and work for both organizations.

Women Save Their Change—The ladies' aid of the Arlington Avenue church, Brooklyn, Dr. John H. Kerr pastor, do their share toward payment of the church mortgage by dropping coins into small steel banks which are opened once a year. Last week these banks were opened and the year's savings came to $300. An informal luncheon was served and the president of the society, Mrs. Warren H. Wilson, whose birthday it was, received a handsome lavalliere from her coworkers.

Criticises President Wilson—Dr. John R. Mackay, pastor of North church, in his Thanksgiving sermon to the united congregations of five churches bitterly criticised President Wilson for attending high mass in Washington instead of going to his own church for the Thanksgiving service.

Drunkards Reform—On Thanksgiving Day the Salvation Army held a "drunkards' service" for the first time in years. Nearly 800 intoxicated men were gathered by workers and listened to speeches on temperance. Forty of the men pledged future total abstinence.

Reelect Evangelistic Officers—The annual meeting of the evangelistic committee of New York City was held Nov. 25 in the home of Mrs. John S. Kennedy. The superintendent reported that the high water mark had been reached as to the number of meetings during the past season and the low water mark as to expense. The treasurer's report showed a marked increase in the last year's receipts with a sufficient balance to carry on the winter's work. At a meeting of the executive committee the day before Dr. Arthur J. Smith was reelected superintendent. All former officers were likewise reelected.

Coming Meetings—The New York Press in a recent Sunday edition devoted one page to an illustrated account of Dr. S. Hall Young and his work in Alaska. Dr. Young will speak at the Ministers' Association Dec. 8.—New York Bible Society will hold its 104th annual meeting in Broadway Tabernacle Sunday evening, Dec. 7. Dr. Charles R. Jefferson will preach. This date is to be observed throughout the country as "Bible Sunday."

In the American Parish—At East Harlem church Thanksgiving Day a union service was held for representatives of all the nationalities using the church and the neighborhood house. There were brief addresses and singing in Italian, Magyar, Swedish and English and singing in Slovak. These union meetings are remarkable when the ordinarily bitter feeling between Slovaks and Magyars is taken into account.

Brief Items—The Brooklyn C. E. union last week sent a telegram to President Wilson asking him not to attend the Pan-American mass in Washington on Thanksgiving Day.—The men's league of Ross Street church, Brooklyn, Rev. John Erskine Adams pastor, at an informal dinner recently laid plans to start a debating society.—The Women's National Sabbath Alliance held its annual meeting in the chapel of Brick church Nov. 24. Officers were reelected: President, Mrs. Don O. Shelton; secretary, Miss Catherine Murray; treasurer, Mrs. Frank R. Van Nest.—The Bowery mission announces that in the six and a half years it has maintained a free labor bureau 21,235 men have been placed in positions. Those who have not made good are less than 1 per cent.

WILL PREPARE FOR CELEBRATION

OHIO—Collingwood Avenue church, Toledo, was honored on the occasion of the annual banquet of its men's brotherhood by a visit from Moderator John Timothy Stone. Over 200 men greeted the guest of honor. The pastor, Samuel C. Black, D. D., is leading in preparations to celebrate the twentieth anniversary of the organization of Collingwood Dec. 28 to 31. Former pastors with their wives will be invited to participate in the celebration. An attempt will be made to secure a thank offering of not less than $26,000 to cancel all indebtedness anent purchase of land for a parish house and make some necessary alterations in the present building.

Says He Is Presbyterian—Rev. R. C. Stoll of Alliance, who recently created considerable discussion by a sermon on Christian Science, writes The Continent: "I am a Presbyterian and have no intention of leaving the church, but am going to do my best to help my brother man forward on the road to happiness and to God and make the church of Jesus Christ a mighty power in the land." He says that through prayer and suggestion he has been able to cure and help a number of persons who have been given up by physicians.

Flood Didn't Hurt Congregation—West Broad Street church, Columbus, which suffered more than any other in the city from the spring flood, is now in better shape than last year. Rev. W. A. Perrins has been pastor for three years and in that time the membership has moved from 208 to 415 members. During the interim services have been held in the high school, and the evening services have been as well attended as a year ago in the church.

Future Ministers Organize—Students for the ministry in Wooster University met at Dr. Weir's home Nov. 17 and formed an organization. The purpose is to provide a fellowship among these men and to encourage other students to enter the ministry.—Wooster Presbytery held an evangelistic conference in First church, Wooster, Nov. 17. Dr. George G. Mahy made addresses on presbyterial and pastoral evangelism.

ARE YOU READY FOR THE CHILLY DAYS?

The advent of cold weather brings new problems for the housewife—problems of domestic service—problems of provision for the wants of children who must be hustled off to school with proper clothing and warm, nourishing meals. Happy is the mother and housewife who knows the uses and nutritive value of Shredded Wheat. It not only contains all the material that is needed to build strong and sturdy bodies for the little ones, but it is rich in what the chemists call calories, or heat-making units. In other words, it not only supplies all the necessary elements for the growing bodies of the children, but it supplies the warmth that is necessary to fortify them against the chilly mornings of autumn and the sudden changes of temperature that come with the approach of winter. One or two biscuits, toasted in the oven to make them crisp and eaten with hot milk and a little cream, is a complete, nourishing meal that will furnish all the strength and warmth needed for a half-day's work or play.

The ideal breakfast food for children is Shredded Wheat Biscuit, because the crispness of the shreds induces complete mastication and hence their little bodies completely assimilate all the body-building elements in the food. The more you chew Shredded Wheat Biscuit the better you will like the nutty flavor of the baked wheat and a child soon learns to eat it because he likes the wheat instead of the cream and sugar. In this way the body is more perfectly nourished and correct tastes are formed so that a child loses the craving for sweets and is gradually trained to eat a food that actually makes sound and healthy tissue and good teeth. In winter time it is best to serve the biscuit with hot milk, a combination which makes a warm, nourishing and strengthening meal.

UNDERFEED
FURNACE OR BOILER
Cuts Your Coal Bills ½ to ⅔

PUT the Underfeed on the job in every home everywhere and the national heating bill would at once be more than cut in half. The Underfeed has solved the problem of reducing cost of heating from ½ to ⅔ in more than 25,000 homes. Mr. B. C. Neat of Louisville took out a topfeed five years ago, because, as he writes: "It cost me from $80 to $120 a year to operate. I thought that too much and installed an Underfeed. My coal bill since then never exceeded $40 per season."

The Underfeed saves, because it successfully burns the cheaper grades of hard and soft coal—slack, pea or buckwheat sizes—consumes and turns into heat all smoke and gases, wasted up chimneys in other heaters. Write TODAY for FREE booklet.

THE PECK-Williamson Underfeed FURNACES BOILERS

Cheerful testimonials from people in your own neighborhood will be sent. Mr. Spencer Otis. Barrington, Illinois, installed two boilers in his fine home with such splendid economical results that he has since placed five more in farm properties he owns.

Heating contractors recognize that an Underfeed adds to renting or selling value of any building.

Exclusive Underfeed Advantages

All fire is on top. No heat-retarding, soot-covered, hard-to-clean heating surfaces. No clinkers, few ashes. Least attention required.

Send rough sketch or blue print of your floors and basement and we will submit FREE Heating Plans and Estimate of Cost. Send Coupon TODAY for FREE Warm Air Furnace or Steam and Hot Water Boiler Book.

MAYOR ATTEMPTS TO BLOCK PLANS

Refuses Approval of Ordinance for Sunday Meetings—Social Service Forces Active—Churches Observe Anniversaries.

PITTSBURG—Work on the erection of the tabernacle for the Sunday evangelistic meetings has been prevented by the mayor's refusal to sign the special ordinance passed by the city council. Grading has been done, lumber has been contracted for, but no effort will be made to rear the building until after next Tuesday, when it is believed the council will pass the ordinance over the mayor's veto. Committees are being organized in every section of the city. Cottage prayer meetings began Tuesday evening, Dec. 2, and will be held twice a week in 2,000 sections of the city.

Plan Social Survey—The Social Service Union inaugurated a campaign for civic righteousness and social betterment at a dinner in Fort Pitt hotel Friday, Nov. 21. The principal address was made by Dr. Samuel Z. Batten of Philadelphia. Rev. John Ray Ewers, president of the union, made an appeal for $5,000 to secure a secretary and make a survey of the city.

Reform Workers Convene—The fiftieth anniversary and the annual convention of the National Reform Association were held in Pittsburg Dec. 1-2. Sectional conferences were held in the First and Second churches and a mass meeting each evening in Exposition hall. Many of the speakers of the Seattle convention were on the Pittsburg program.

Three Anniversaries—New Covenant mission, Rev. Maurice Reuben, a converted Jew, superintendent, observed its fifteenth anniversary Nov. 26 to Dec. 3.—West End church observed its seventy-first anniversary with appropriate services Nov. 23 and 24. The pastor, Dr. John Young, was assisted by Dr. W. O. Campbell, Hugh T. Kerr, Dr. David Schaff and Rev. Charles Wingerd, a former pastor. —Congruity church, near Greensburg, celebrated its 125th anniversary Nov. 23. Addresses were made by the pastor, Rev. John D. McBride, Rev. A. O. Raber, Rev. H. U. Davis and Rev. F. C. Steele, a son of the church.

Methodist Turns Socialist — Rev. William A. Prosser, a Methodist, has been a stanch supporter of socialism, and has resigned to become the pastor of the United People's church organized a few weeks ago by the Christian socialists of Pittsburg.

CHURCH BEGAN UNDER A PEAR TREE

Six Italian Boys Nucleus of Important Work—Ministers Talk on Socialism—Two Congregations Unite.

PHILADELPHIA—The Second Italian church, largely the result of the enterprise of A. A. Scott, who a few years ago started a Sunday school with six Italian boys under a pear tree in the back yard of his West Philadelphia home, dedicated a handsome building on Thanksgiving Day. The work started with one man and 50 cents capital and has had marvelous growth among the Italians. It has a $20,000 property. Rev. H. E. Jones, pastor of the neighboring Addison Henry Memorial church, presided at the dedication service, William H. Scott at the Friday evening meeting following and the pastor, Rev. Nicholas Mucci, on Saturday evening. A. A. Scott is superintendent of the Bible school and the church has a provisional session of elders from prominent churches.

Talk of Socialism—Before the November meeting of the Social Union Dr. Charles R. Erdman of Princeton Seminary and Dr. John McDowell of Newark, N. J., discussed socialism. "There are in the United States," said Dr. Erdman, "fifty cities having socialistic mayors, 100 city councils more or less socialistic and 1,000 Socialists holding public office." Dr. McDowell maintained that the church must give leadership to this great movement so as to convert it into a blessing to the world.

Two Churches Join Forces—The consolidation of two Presbyterian churches in the northwestern section of the city, East Park and Knox, has been effected. The building of the first will be sold and a church erected on the site of the second at 25th street and Indiana avenue. The name of the united church will be East Park. Rev. H. C. Cooper, pastor of Knox church, will be minister.

Confer on Evangelism—A conference on evangelism in Philadelphia North Presbytery was held in Mount Airy church Dec. 2. The committee having it in charge were Dr. W. B. Lower, Dr. Cheesman Herrick, William H. Scott, Rev. B. B. Royer, Rev. William McNally, Rev. H. C. McBride and Rev. James M. Welch.

Young People Help Revival—The two weeks' revival campaign of Bethel church, Rev. David S. Clark pastor, was greatly aided by a band of over seventy young people who marched to the meetings wearing badges. They had their headquarters in the Sunday school building and sought to arouse the neighborhood. They distributed 5,000 invitations to the services and visited many homes.

Bits of News—J. Warren Miller, M. D., and his contemplated bride, Miss Ina C. Bowman, both of St. Paul's church, are under appointment to mission work in the Philippines and will leave Philadelphia Dec. 6.—Dr. W. S. Holt, the new associate secretary of the Board of Ministerial Relief and Sustentation, made an address at the recent half century celebration of home missions of the Reformed Church in the United States. At one of the night sessions John Wanamaker presided and Dr. Charles Thompson of New York spoke.—A feature of a patriotic service in Richardson Memorial church was a camp fire with songs of fifty years ago and stories of Gettysburg by veterans.—The Presbyterian ministers will listen to two sermons at their December Monday meetings, one by Rev. Alexander McCall of Second church and one Dec. 22 by Dr. David Tully.—Chambers-Wylie church is planning a homecoming communion for Dec. 14.

Grieve at Dr. Johnson's Death—The announcement of the death of Dr. Herrick Johnson occasioned much surprise as well as sorrow to his many friends in this city. Only four days previous to the event he attended the ministers' Monday meeting, as was his custom. At the next meeting Doctors Kennedy, Steckel and Hyndman were appointed to draft an expression of the brethren's sentiment respecting his life.

Kate Douglas Wiggin will contribute to The Youth's Companion's next volume two articles of abounding and pervasive charm. They are in part autobiographical and describe the author's girlish experiences in opening the first kindergarten in San Francisco.

Rev. W. H. Clagett, pastor of Grace church, Pittsburg, recently lectured before the ministers of that city on "The Martyr Graves of Scotland."

Earn $5 to Add to Your Christmas Money

The Continent will pay $5 in cash for the best letter, and $2 for the next best, if available, in each of three classes. We want your personal experiences in investing your savings—$100, $500, $5,000 or any amount—for use in the semi-annual financial number, January 1st. Your name need not appear if you so prefer. Letters should not exceed 200 to 500 words.

Five Dollars to a Minister

Tell us about "My Successful Investments." The money put into worthless mining stock we all want to forget. Tell us of those that proved good (names of companies not to be printed) for the help and guidance of others. And be sure to tell how you were led to put it where you did.

Five Dollars for a Woman

Women without business training often have difficulty in deciding where to invest money. Give others the benefit of your experience, telling where to invest rather than where not to.

Five Dollars for a Parent

"Saving for our Child": By what system are you putting away money (in however small amounts) for the education or comfort of your children? Your ideas may help others. How did you teach your children to save? Any tried plan for persuading children to proper thrift will be acceptable for the competition.

By December 16th

Letters will be judged December 16th and checks mailed at once, to reach the successful ones in time to add to the Christmas account. Quick work is necessary. Better write the Financial Editor today at the Chicago or New York office of

FUTURE VOTE ON SALOON ABOLITION

Chicago Temperance Forces Plan for an Educational Campaign—Dr. Stone in New Manse—Would Open Training School to Men.

CHICAGO—At a conferences of various persons interested in fighting the liquor traffic a few days ago a comprehensive plan of action was adopted, indorsed by all temperance bodies. This involves work which looks to a vote on the abolition of saloons in Chicago between 1915 and 1918. The campaign embraces the contemplated use of posters and other means to let people generally know the effect of alcoholic beverages from a scientific standpoint. The names of firms and corporations friendly to temperance will be obtained and an effort made to enlist employees in the fight. Committees will be formed in various parts of the city organized so as to carry the fight into local option elections in order that the people may be educated to the need of electing public officials who are not friendly to liquor interests.

Show Commissioners the City—Tentative arrangements are being made to take the commissioners to General Assembly on a trip about the city during one day of their stay here during the meeting in May. Missions, hospital and seminary will be visited to show the delegates the problems of Chicago and how they are being solved.

Dr. Stone Moves Into Manse—The manse of the new Fourth church is now being occupied by the pastor, Dr. John Timothy Stone. The manse forms part of the quadrangle of the new church plant, which will not be occupied in its entirety for several months. Some of the club rooms will, however, be in use by Jan. 1.

Make Others Happy—On Thanksgiving Day the young men's club of Christ church observed the annual custom of giving a "turkey dinner" to 100 children from the orphan asylum near the church. The boys and girls marched to the church in a body and gathered round tables that were laden with good things. Sixteen turkeys were roasted and served by the young men of the club. The senior Endeavor society sent forty-eight well filled baskets to as many families. Each basket contained enough food for a Thanksgiving dinner.—Special Thanksgiving services at West Superior Street mission and at Popular hall were largely attended.

Money for Charities and Sunday Schools—Campaigns under vigorous, organized leadership are now being conducted for the United Charities and for the expenses of the international Sunday school convention to be held here next spring. For the charities society 150 business men are canvassing with daily luncheons at Hotel LaSalle. The suburbs of the city are also being asked to assist. Cook county has been divided into twenty-seven districts for the Sunday school canvass, with lists of possible contributors in the hands of solicitors who have been trained at special meetings in various churches. It is hoped to raise $100,000.

Ask All to Church—Residents of Morgan Park were all urged to attend some church last Sunday and although it rained most of the inhabitants listened to sermons. This effort followed a canvass of the residents to ascertain religious affiliation.—The Dec. 8 Ministeral Association program will be furnished by the Presbyterian Training School. A number of young women from the school and graduates now employed in Chicago churches will take part.

More Training School Directors—Directors of the Presbyterian Training School have reenforced themselves by electing as members of the corporation Arthur B. Hall, Rev. Henry Hepburn, Dr. C. B. McAfee, Donald S. McWilliams, James Smart, Nelson Willard and Oliver R. Williamson. A declaration favoring the enlargement of the work by the admission of young men was adopted by the directors.

Presbytery Busy — Presbytery last Monday adopted the report of the committee on old people's home, naming the first board of directors, who organized last Tuesday. The search for proper location is in progress.—P. A. Font, a former Roman Catholic professor in Italy, was received by presbytery. He is in charge of an Italian mission for the Church Extension Board.—J. W. Helmer, elder of Sixth church, 95 years old Saturday, was remembered by presbytery.—Doctors Beattie, Clark and Luccock were among those who spoke in connection with the dismissal of Dr. Boyle to Detroit.

Still After Money—Buena Memorial congregation has raised $42,500 and last Monday night committees reorganized to continue the campaign until the $125,000 is pledged.

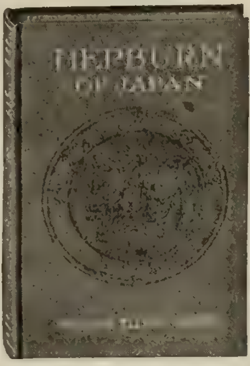
Activities of Men—The men of Seventh church have elected officers for a brotherhood organization.—Fathers and sons of Normal Park church recently had a largely attended dinner. An athletic director will be employed for the boys' work.—Men of Maywood are leading in a religious canvass to end in a "Go to Church Day."

Brief Items—The last luncheon of Presbyterian men in the present series was held Tuesday of this week. The attendance has been large and the interest in Dr. C. B. McAfee's talks keen.—Dr. McAfee will lecture at the training school Dec. 4 and 11 at 1:30 o'clock on the Westminster confession in its relation to social service. Visitors are welcome. —Herscher church, with a large building and manse, will probably be dissolved by presbytery. There are now only six Presbyterian families in town with plenty of other churches.—Rev. A. F. Waldo has taken up his work at Riverside and will be installed as pastor on Dec. 15. — The fifth anniversary of Rev. J. E. Walker at First U. P. church was observed Sunday and by a reception Monday evening. — The women's Bible class of First church has organized a series of lectures designed to teach women the duties of citizenship. Jane Addams, Mary McDowell and Professor C. E. Merriam will be among the speakers. —Presbyterian college presidents to the number of twenty met at McCormick Seminary in annual conclave Tuesday of this week.

TO ADVERTISE LOSS THROUGH SALOONS

CEDAR RAPIDS, IOWA—This city is stirred over moral conditions. At the ministerial union meeting a committee on public morals was appointed, Rev. E. J. Lockwood chairman. Charles Stelzle was in conference with a committee Dec. 1, having spent a day in the city. The Wesleyan class of St. Paul's M. E. church has engaged space in three local dailies to show the account of Cedar Rapids with the saloons, giving the saloons full credit for all the license money paid in ($64,000 a year) and charging to the saloons their cost to the city. — The commercial club through a large committee has made definite plans to raise the annual budget of $7,000 of Sunshine mission.

The Duke of Argyle, K. G., is surely on his native heath when he portrays the Scot from his emergence out of prehistoric times into the modern type. This he has done for the next volume of The Youth's Companion.



A BOOK
The Unsurpassable Gift

Hepburn of Japan By Wm. E. Griffis, D.D., L.H.D.
There were four great pioneers of the Gospel and Christian civilization in Japan, Verbeck, Brown, Hepburn and Williams. This volume completes the biography of that one who was second on the ground and possibly the first in general usefulness. America's greatest gift to Japan was in these men.
Few books written to-day are so calculated to show old Japan in true colors and to reveal the amazing influence and work of American missionaries and teachers in the making of the new Japan as is this volume. $1.50 net, postpaid.

Habeeb the Beloved By William S. Nelson, D. D.
A delightful picture of life in Syria by a missionary of many years' experience. His thorough acquaintance with the people has enabled him to write a book which transports the reader to this Land of the Book. In the preface Dr. Nelson says: "This is neither a biography nor a history. It is, rather, an effort to picture the life of Syrian Christians in order that a deeper and truer sympathy for them may be realized." 75 cents net, postpaid.

CHINA HAS RIGHT OF WAY IN CHURCHES

Special Meetings in St. Louis—Five Institutions Look After People of East End—Annual Budget for Weak Congregations.

ST. LOUIS—As far as Presbyterians were concerned the city was given over to advancing the cause of Christianity in China from Friday, Nov. 21, to Nov. 24. The contributions made for the work in China were satisfactory, though the names of donors and amounts given were withheld.

Care for People in East End—The Presbyterian Church can no longer be accused of being indifferent to the masses in this city. It has what is coming to be commonly called an East End parish. In this parish the following institutions, comprising social, philanthropic, industrial and religious features, are supported: Markham church (institutional), Greeley Memorial, Niedringhaus mission, Victor Street mission and Boyle Center. The last named is in the heart of the Italian settlement. It was for years a People's church, later it was known as Central mission and two years ago, when Rev. W. Clyde Smith was appointed head worker, the name was changed and a number of new institutional features added. Nov. 21 the twenty-sixth all-day meeting was held at Boyle Center. Services began at 10 a. m. and continued without a break until 5 p. m. Among the speakers were Rev. Henry W. Luce of the Shantung University. At the close of his address it was decided to form a woman's missionary society to support a Bible reader in China. There were present at the all-day meeting probably 300 people, some from homes of luxury and some from homes of poverty. Wednesday preceding Thanksgiving Day a dinner was served to 150 mothers, members of the Bible class which has been taught by Mrs. Sue Owens for more than thirty years. Rev. E. W. McClusky has succeeded Mr. Smith.

Raise Budget Each March—S. J. Niccolls, D. D., was made chairman of the new committee on benevolences which was recently established by presbytery. March of each year is set apart for the raising of the budget for the various boards. An annual budget will be provided for all money needed for dependent churches—downtown institutions, the weaker city churches and country congregations. All funds for local work aside from those raised by the dependent congregations themselves are to be placed in the hands of a local treasurer who will receive credit by the Home Board for all money paid by him.

Brief Items—W. P. Williamson, D. D., president of the Federation of Churches in this city, delivered an address on socialism at a meeting of the Evangelical Alliance Monday morning, Nov. 24, in the public library.—Dr. J. L. Mauze, pastor of Central church, who has been making a specialty of the evening service for some weeks, preached Sunday evening, Nov. 23, on "The Miracle of the Conversion of ex-Governor Patterson."—Presbyterian pastors of St. Louis have joined other Protestant bodies protesting against a monument to the brewer, Busch, who recently died.

THREE CHURCHES MAKE IMPROVEMENTS

TACOMA—The Sprague Memorial church has been undergoing extensive and much needed repairs and the outlook is more encouraging than for a long time. Rev. William E. Bates is pastor.

Quarters Too Small—The old quarters have been found too small for Calvary church and Sunday school and an addition has been made to this church. They have had a good year with Dr. Staudt as pastor.—First church feels the need of better Sunday school accommodations. A congregational meeting enthusiastically approved the plan presented by the church boards and authorized them to go ahead at considerable expense.

Evangelism Conference; China Campaign—Dr. Murdoch McLeod is a member of Assembly's evangelistic committee and chairman of the same committee of Olympia Presbytery. A two days' conference on evangelism arranged by presbytery's committee was well attended.—Rev. Ernest F. Hall visited Tacoma in the interest of the China campaign. A large committee of arrangements was appointed with every church represented. The missionary team is expected for the campaign in January.

CONFER ON MEN'S WORK

PENNSYLVANIA—Beaver Presbytery held a conference on men's work in Beaver Falls church, Rev. G. B. Laird pastor, Nov. 18. Thirteen of the twenty-six churches of presbytery were represented by sixty-seven men. The conference opened at 4 p. m. and continued until 9 o'clock. At 7 o'clock a banquet was served. The details were looked after by the presbyterial brotherhood committee, Charles N. Ramsey, Beaver Falls, chairman. Dr. J. T. Henderson of Chicago, one of the national secretaries, was the principal speaker.

New Financial Plan Successful—Newcastle First church recently decided to abolish pew rents and obtain running expenses by subscription from every member in the congregation. The committee hoped to obtain pledges of $1,800 over running expenses, but in a short time the total reached $2,300 in excess of the expenses of the church.

Brief Items—Trustees of Washington First church have been authorized to buy or build a parsonage.—Rev. R. B. Culp has resigned at Shickshinny in order to accept the call to assist Rev. Richard B. Webster, for forty years the pastor of Westminster church, Wikes-Barre. This church has nearly doubled in membership since the Sunday meetings six months ago and has now over 1,000 members.

HOLD FIRST SERVICE OF UNITED CHURCH

Montclair Congregations Form One—New Building at Vineland—Newark People Help Institutionalize Chapel.

NEW JERSEY—The first service of Central church, Montclair, was held Dec. 3. Central church is the new name of the combined Trinity and First churches, and a commission from Newark Presbytery formally announced the union at the service. Dr. William Y. Chapman, pastor of Roseville Avenue church, preached the sermon. Communion will be administered on Sunday. Last Sunday, Nov. 30, the pastorate of Dr. Llewellyn S. Fulmer, who has ministered to First church for twelve years, was concluded.

Brief Items—Vineland Presbyterians laid the corner stone of a $40,000 church on Thanksgiving day.—The lecture course of the men's club of Munn Avenue church, East Orange, was opened with an address by Dan Crawford. The next lecture will be Jan. 12, when Rabbi S. Wise of New York will speak.—Third church, Newark, Rev. R. S. Inglis pastor, gave a reception Nov. 24 to the members of High Street and Clinton Avenue churches. These two latter congregations contemplate uniting with Third church.

Raise Large Sum for Chapel—Nov. 23 the members of Second church in Newark at the morning service subscribed $3,600 toward a total amount of $5,000 asked for to further the work of the West Side Park chapel, an offshoot of Second church. Rev. Charles N. Thomas, pastor of the chapel, spoke at this service. The money will be used principally in the erection of an institutional addition to the chapel, which will probably cost about $20,000, of which a large part has already been received.

News of Elizabeth—Third church brotherhood has been reorganized with a program along lines of civic study.—At First church, W. F. Whittaker, D. D., pastor, Nov. 22, a company of young people acted the part of immigrants landing at Ellis Island.—Rev. William B. Hamilton, who has spent all of his ministerial life with Westminster Hope Memorial chapel, celebrated the twentieth anniversary of his ordination Nov. 16.

Study Sunday School Methods—An institute on Sunday school efficiency will be held in St. Cloud church, West Orange, Friday, Dec. 12. Dr. Carl Herman Wintsch, director of teacher training in the Essex County Sunday School Asociation and superintendent of the Newark Religious Institute, will speak in the afternoon. A conference on the home department will be conducted by Shelton C. Hemstreet.—The third annual dinner of the men's club of First German church, Orange, recently was prepared entirely by the members of the club. Dr. Herman C. Gruhnert is pastor.—The men's club of Connecticut Farms church in Union township met for its annual banquet recently.

Superintendent Dies—First church, Atlantic City, Rev. Henry Merle Mellen minister, has met with a severe loss in the recent sudden death of Elder and Superintendent of the Sunday School Charles K. Lippincott. The Sunday school held a memorial service for him Sunday, Nov. 16. He was 58 years of age.—A missionary rally of all the Atlantic City churches was held in First church Nov. 22. It was addressed by Dr. Isaac T. Headland, author of "China's New Day."

CLERGY AND LAITY

Rev. James Roberson of Madrid, N. Y., recently celebrated his thirty years as pastor of Waddington Scotch church.

Reports are current in Pittsburg that Dr. W. L. McEwan, pastor of Third church, has refused the presidency of Princeton Seminary.

Dr. John T. Bergen of First church, Minneapolis, recently spent a week in the northern part of Minnesota holding meetings in the lumber camps.

Dr. Juan Orts y Gonzalez, former Roman Catholic priest, now a member of the Southern church, was married to Miss Nina Latimer of Richmond, Va., a few days ago. They will engage in mission work at Laguna, Cuba.

Ex-President Taft tells in an article he has written for The Youth's Companion how he went to the East believing that the missionaries might better be spending their energies at home, and how his experiences in the East convinced him that they are the most efficient agents of civilization now at work.

The Every-Day Life of ABRAHAM LINCOLN
By FRANCIS FISHER BROWNE

A narrative and descriptive biography of Lincoln, with many personal recollections by those who knew him intimately which brings Lincoln the man, not Lincoln the tradition, very near to us. The great events of his life, and impressions of his character, are given in the actual words of those who knew him best—his friends, neighbors and daily associates.

One volume, 640 pages, 3 portraits, beautifully printed and bound.

Strong Evangelist Has Spare Time
Would Like to Hold Union Evangelist Meetings in January-February

Robert E. Johnson, an evangelist now holding meetings in Sault Ste. Marie, Mich., where he is having marvelous decisions for Christ, finds he has time for a January-February meeting. He would like to get into communication at once with anyone who wishes to have such meetings at that time. He has been in the work for 14 years and bears the strongest recommendations from all places he has been and from all the leading workers who have heard him.

If you want an evangelist to hold union meetings communicate with him at Sault Ste. Marie, Mich., until Dec. 15 later telegraph him care of Western Union, Minneapolis Minn., or write him at permanent address, 602 Lakeside Building, Chicago, Illinois. He and party are at liberty for the above time. Address:

REV. ROBERT E. JOHNSON, Evangelist
He is a member of the Presbytery of Minneapolis.

PRESENT DAY THEOLOGY
By Washington Gladden
Second Edition

"I feel that I owe you a real debt of gratitude for your book I read it at once, and covered it with pencil marks. And I am having it read to my daughter of sixteen. Indeed I intend to order several copies to send to my friends, who need just such a remarkably clear exposition to get the thing straight in their minds. Thanking you for the service you have done me, I am sincerely yours, Winston Churchill."

"The expression of the thought and conviction of a man, a real, live, alert, earnest man inspired by and spoken to an eager audience of living, listening men and women."—Methodist Review.

"The root ideas of Dr. Gladden's theology are the ideas which thoughtful and intelligent men, men well accredited in all the leading denominations, are now accepting."—The Christian Work.

"It appeals to the reader as it must have done to the nearer by addressing itself directly and favorably to the plain man's mind. It is just the book for the average man."—The Congregationalist.

"Ministers often ask where the most advanced views may be found; we venture to say that they are popularly expressed in this book by the veteran Columbus pastor."—The Continent

SOME CHURCH EFFICIENCY HINTS

Have Headquarters — Local Presbyterian headquarters have been established in an office building at Cedar Rapids, Iowa, to accommodate three synodical officers who reside there.

Make Map of Presbytery—A committee has been appointed to prepare a map of Twin Falls Presbytery and present a report of the spring meeting showing the location of all churches and preaching stations and Sabbath schools and the population and religious advantages of the communities in which they are located.

Shows Work by Charts—The efficiency commission of Third church, Rochester, N. Y., recently gave an exhibit in the parish house of a series of charts showing in graphic form the work of the church. At a future meeting recommendations as to possible changes in methods of work will be made by committees appointed for the purpose.

Hold Conference—An efficiency conference was held in Falk, Idaho, church Nov. 2 under the direction of the superintendent of home missions, Dr. Barton. This was an all-day meeting. Various phases of church life and work were discussed and definite plans adopted with a view to increased efficiency in work. Rev. Stewart Hunter is pastor.

Survey Whole District—Rev. John T. Hartman, Sunday school missionary, who has been working in Kansas during the past month, recently took a survey and canvass of the town of Arma, Kan., where very little religious work has been done. There are over 430 adults and in these families there are 480 children. Twenty-six families gave the Presbyterian church as their preference. The secretary of the synodical home mission commission, Walter M. Irwin, D. D., is cooperating with the home mission committee to care for this field.

Improve Financial Methods—Rev. Moses Breeze, field secretary for the Home Board, concluded his itinerary in South Dakota Nov. 16. Mr. Breeze has helped a large number of churches in the state and has been instrumental in reducing the requests of several fields for aid. At Salem plans were worked out which will mean the reaching of self-support of this church in a year. At Avon, where a new church was recently organized, $1,000 was raised for improvements and salary. With only fifteen members in this church it is a remarkable showing. At Mitchell, where the church became self-supporting this spring, in addition to making improvements worth $3,500, the new method of church finance was introduced and the church greatly strengthened and encouraged.

SCHOOL AND COLLEGE

Lenox College Successful—Lenox College during the past seven years has raised nearly $250,000 for endowment and other purposes.

Half Are Presbyterians—According to a summary of the religious affiliations of the students of Huron College half of them are Presbyterian. Methodists and Congregationalists together total 28 per cent of the membership. Sixty per cent of the student body claim membership in some church.

Begins Twenty-First Year—Dr. William M. Irvine is beginning his twenty-first year as headmaster at Mercersburg Academy. During this time the buildings have increased from one to twelve and graduates have been sent to ninety-three different colleges and universities. Last year a Mercersburg boy was captain of the football team of Pembroke College, Oxford.

Install President Dec. 9—Plans for the inauguration of Dr. George E. Fellows as president of James Millikin University have been completed for Dec. 9 and 10. The exercises begin at 9 o'clock Tuesday morning and include a banquet at 12:30 with after dinner speeches, a popular meeting Tuesday evening and a conference of Presbyterian educators Wednesday morning.

Ripon Gets $50,000 — The General Education Board has given Ripon College $50,000 toward a total of $300,000 for new endowment. With this gift more than half the proposed amount is subscribed and a campaign for the remainder is being carried forward vigorously. The present effort to double the endowment of the college is the third and last part of a plan deliberately formed by the administration a dozen years ago for the expansion of Ripon College.

From Various Institutions—The Girls' Collegiate School of Los Angeles, Cal., entered upon its twenty-second year with an increased enrollment. The first year of college work has been added to the course. The pupils come not only from the vicinity, but from the South, the East and middle West.—The colored school at Valliant, Okla., is now under the care of Dr. W. H. Carroll, who was for a time pastor of the colored church at Garvin.—The girls of the Y. W. C. A. of Whitman College celebrated the national week of prayer by giving a pageant of missions on successive days.—Western College had the spiritual uplift of a sermon recently by Thomas F. Day, D. D., formerly of San Francisco Theological Seminary. Dr. Day is now professor of biblical literature in Olivet College, Olivet, Mich.—Founders' Day at Coe College will be observed Thursday eve-

New Books of Spiritual Interest

The Way Home By the author of "The Inner Shrine." BASIL KING

"One sees and feels the materialism of our day, nowhere so great maybe, as in New York. The book is a brilliant and moving demonstration of the thesis, 'Man cannot live by bread alone.' The situations are clear, and skillfully handled, the characters real people. The book interests—holds, moves one. It is a book you want to lend to a friend, and then when he has read it, sit and talk it over with him. I will preach on it some evening."—N. McGee Waters, Pastor, The Tompkins Ave. Congregational Church, Brooklyn. Illustrated. $1.35 net.

Thirty Pieces of Silver

By CLARENCE B. KELLAND

Dramatic as a play, with the spiritual appeal of a poetic allegory, is this telling of the vision that came to a brilliant atheistic orator. The coin that slipped from the greedy palm of Judas down through the ages into the modern lecturer's hand convicted him as an accomplice of the Great Betrayer. Illustratea. Cloth, 50 cents net; leather, in four different shaaes, $1.00 net.

Finding His Soul

By NORMAN DUNCAN

A big-hearted, merry man, is one of the best traveling salesmen in his line. His little boy dies, and the cruel blow unhinges his reason. The firm sends him abroad in the hope of rescuing him from his bitter unreason. He visits the Holy Land. The reality of the land which gave religion to the Western World arouses him. On Christmas Eve, among the hills of Bethlehem, he has a wonderful experience: finds his soul. Illustrated. 16*mo, cloth,* 50 cents net; leather, in four different shades, $1.00 net.

Prayer—What It Is and What It Does

By DR. SAMUEL McCOMB

The writer, who is associate director of the Emmanuel Church Movement in Boston, points out in this book the new interest in prayer which is apparent everywhere. Scientifically minded men no longer scoff at this wonderful force, he shows, but are endeavoring to understand something of its nature and its results. The aim of prayer, the effect of prayer, the practicability of prayer are all emphasized, and the author concludes with valuable hints as to how the habit of prayer may be acquired. 16*mo, cloth,* 50 cents net; leather, $1.00 net.

Peloubet's UNIFORM LESSON Quarterlies

¶ The editors and publisher of the Peloubet Series of Quarterlies have ever united in striving to make this series unexcelled.

¶ The entire series is edited on a careful, systematic, and graded plan, and commencing with the smallest child moves steadily forward up to the most studious adult, each Quarterly being closely adapted to suit the specific needs of its grade.

¶ We also publish a series of TEACHER'S QUARTERLIES, which contain helpful material for the teacher to use in preparing the lesson, and which have become indispensable during the past years.

¶ We have made these Quarterlies for over thirty years, and continue to put them before the religious world, feeling confident they will, as in years past, be appreciated by all discerning minds.

¶ We shall be glad to send free samples and catalogue giving full details to all intending purchasers.

ning, Dec. 4, in Sinclair chapel beginning with a banquet.—Hastings College now has two young ladies' literary societies, as a second one has recently been organized with about a dozen members.

With Kentucky Institutions—Recent speakers at the Kentucky Theological Seminary have been Rev. L. I. Moffett and Dr. R. T. Shields of China, William T. Ellis and Thornton Whaling, D. D. The list of speakers at the Monday evening meetings has included a number of well known men.—The contract for the new buildings at Kentucky College for Women, Danville, Ky., has been let and work on the east dormitory has already begun. This will be followed by the erection of Morgan hall and such other improvements as are contemplated.

Postpone Moving of College—On account of unavoidable and unexpected delays in finishing the new buildings the moving of Occidental College to the new campus has been postponed until some time in the spring. The donors of the buildings have expressed the desire that everything be complete before the dedication. Los Angeles Presbytery was planning a banquet of at least 1,000 Presbyterians and found that the only caterer who could take charge of so large a gathering could not do this any time in December on account of the holiday rush. The banquet will be put off until the time is finally selected for carrying out the quarter-centennial celebration.

CITY BAND AT CHURCH DEDICATION

Schools Dismissed in Honor of Presbyterian Event—Rural Institute at Small Church—Auto Helps Pastor.

NEBRASKA—Members of First church, Madison, are jubilant over the success of the building plans. A few months ago the church undertook to build a new church costing $25,000 under the leadership of John E. Farmer, D. D., pastor. In spite of difficulties the building committee was able to commence the erection of a beautiful church. Nov. 18 the corner stone was laid. The exercises were held in the open air and the whole community participated, the schools being dismissed and the city band furnishing the music. Alexander Corkey, D. D., of Wayne, vice moderator of synod, delivered the address.

Young Town; New Church—Broadwater is less than five years old and although there are only ten persons on the roll of the Presbyterian church a new building was dedicated recently under the direction of the pastor, Rev. W. J. Eby.

Have Rural Life Institute—Rev. Cecil Phillips and his congregation at Panama recently carried forward successfully a second rural life institute. It was well attended and well received. Domestic science, agricultural and stock experts shared in the program with two pastors, Leon D. Young, D. D., of Beatrice and Rev. R. W. Caughey of Lincoln.

Need More Room—The Florence church Sunday school, which on a recent Sunday numbered 181, so crowds its small frame structure that credittable work is impossible. Rev. James B. Butter, pastor, has assurance from church leaders that something will be done shortly to better accommodate the school.

At Plattsmouth and Wood River—Rev. J. Wallace Lorimer, who accepted Plattsmouth church for one year, closed his work Nov. 1 with the parish showing distinct advances. Additional to the systematizing of the finances and the enlargement and improvement of the Sunday school, the church building has been improved.—Wood River church under Rev. Horace G. Clair, pastor, has completed improvements costing $3,000. The building was raised and a basement built. The work for boys and men is receiving special attention and the playroom, game room and library and reading room are very attractive. A recent dinner meeting was addressed by Dr. A. F. Ernst of Grand Island.

Form Ministerial Union—Ministers of the central part of the state have formed the Platte Valley Ministerial Union, which meets monthly in various towns and includes ministers of all denominations. The last meeting was held at Mitchell in the Presbyterian church.

Auto for Pastor Helps Church—South Auburn church is exerting a marked influence upon the surrounding country. Good roads and an automobile make it possible for the pastor, J. H. Salsbury, D. D., to extend his pastoral calls miles into the country, attend social and other midweek gatherings and conduct Sabbath afternoon services in the neighborhood schoolhouse. As a partial result a number of influential farmers and their families have recently been welcomed into the church.

Will Train His Teachers—A junior congregation receives attention and contributes its attendance at the morning service of Hebron church. Rev. J. M. Hamilton, pastor, has started a flourishing teacher training class.

PLEDGE HALF OF AMOUNT IN ONE DAY

COLORADO—As a start toward raising $15,000 required to complete the church building of Montview church, Denver, Colo., $8,000 was pledged at the morning and evening services Nov. 16. It is expected that the total amount will be raised in a short time.—After two months' trial of the plan, officers of First church, Pueblo, are much pleased with the combination of Sunday school and morning worship into one service. A male chorus of forty leads the evening singing.—The C. E. society of First church, Pueblo, is planning to provide a Christmas tree for a number of needy children.

CHILDREN LEARN NEW CATECHISM

ILLINOIS—Six children of Prospect church, Dunlap, have been awarded Bibles by the Sunday School Board for memorizing the intermediate catechism. The pastor, Rev. L. H. McCormick, conducts a children's religious training class.

Preaches on the Home—Rev. J. H. Smith, Rushville, is preaching a series of sermons relating to the home on Sunday evenings under the title "The Wedding Ring, or the Making of a Happy Home."

Raises Forty-One Year Old Debt—A Thanksgiving turkey dinner was served by Kewanee church to its congregation in celebration of the clearing of its $2,500 building debt. This is the first time in its forty-one years of history that this church has been out of debt. A new Sunday school room is projected. Rev. W. F. Jones is pastor.

Honor Old Professor—At the recent dedication of the new school of music building at James Millikin University the trustees announced that the recital hall in this building would be named after Professor H. H. Kaeuper, who has been director of the school of music since the opening of the university.

Men Active in Evangelism—A quiet but well organized evangelistic campaign is going on in Second church, Decatur. Forty people have united with this church within the past month. The men are especially active in this movement.

Two Churches Show Growth—Rev. J. W. Elder and his people at Argenta are completing a well equipped church to cost $11,000. They will dedicate soon.—The church at Mount Zion has been completely overhauled at a cost of $1,600. This is one of many evidences of the aggressive leadership of Rev. L. D. Lasswell.

Church Open Six Days a Week—Rev. and Mrs. G. Harrison Worden of Salina, Kan., are in charge of a successful evangelistic campaign in Wilmington church and will continue special services another week. Dr. John Welsh, pastor, has the church open every day in the week but Monday in the regular work with various classes and meetings.

Various Items—Muphysboro church has recently raised $9,000 to wipe out the debt on the building and redecorate the interior. The church will be dedicated Jan. 4.—The seventh anniversary of the fire which destroyed the chapel which later led to the erection of Willow Avenue church, Joliet, was observed recently by the pledging of $500 toward the church debt. Rev. C. F. Bruhn, pastor, and others spoke.—Mrs. C. O. Longenecker of Rochelle, known widely for her philanthropy and interest in missions, died at her home recently. She was born in Pittsburg in 1845.—The thank offering taken up in First church, Decatur, Nov. 23 netted over $1,000.

WOULD UNITE RIGHTEOUSNESS FORCES

Citizenship Conference Plans Definite Advance in Iowa—Corning and Rockwell City Have New Church Buildings.

IOWA—At the recent Christian citizenship conference at Des Moines the citizens of the state were urged to unite the forces of righteousness to obtain Bible reading in schools, suppress Mormonism, obtain better Sabbath observance and obtain a uniform marriage and divorce law. W. R. Sawhill of Washington was elected president of the state organization.

Two Churches Dedicated — All the Protestant churches of the town united in the dedication of the new Corning church the middle of this month. The sermon was preached by Dr. M. V. Higbee of Omaha, a former pastor. The structure cost $14,500 and is practically free of debt. The pastor is Rev. Norman MacLeod.—The new church of Rockwell City was dedicated Nov. 23 free of debt. The building is modern in every way and cost $9,000. Dr. A. B. Marshall of Omaha and Dr. C. H. Purmort of Des Moines took important parts in the dedication. Good work has been done on this field in the past five years by the pastor, Rev. Gilbert Voorhies.

Des Moines Items—Rev. Joseph B. Howard is in the midst of the erection of a new church at Park avenue.—J. W. Countermine, D. D., of Cottage Grove Avenue church has just closed a series of special meetings which he conducted alone which have proven to be helpful.—Robert K. Porter, D. D., of First church has been obliged to take a short rest under medical care.—The C. E. societies of Park Avenue and First churches were awarded banners for attendance at the recent young people's mass meeting.

New Building Going Up—The corner stone of the new Hamburg church was laid Nov. 17 by the pastor assisted by one of the elders, Dr. S. T. Mitchel. The building will soon be inclosed and the work pushed to a finish by early spring.

Press Home Immigration Truths—Mediapolis church observed home mission week with special meetings each night. The pastor, Rev. Philip Palmer, spoke one night and others made addresses other evenings. Friday evening eighty men attended a fellowship supper, followed by a series of talks.

Adds to Mission Interest—Nevada church, Rev. J. G. Leitch pastor, has recently assumed the support of a member of the congregation who is in training for foreign medical service. The church has recently been renovated, a pipe organ installed and new pulpit furniture purchased.

Various Items—Members of the Bible study class of First church, Sioux City, recently enjoyed a social evening with addresses on the importance of the Bible.—Improvements are being made in the building at Summit which will cost $1,500. A basement is being built and a furnace installed. Rev. H. P. Gray preaches here as well as at Mount Union and Eldridge.—Cleghorn church has suffered a great loss in the death of William Countermine, for many years an elder. He was a veteran of the civil war and was the father of J. W. Countermine, D. D., pastor of the Cottage Grove Avenue church, Des Moines.

RAISE $3,oco IN THREE WEEKS

MICHIGAN—A committee of trustees of Alma, Mich., church in three weeks raised $3,000 to cancel the indebtedness on church and manse. At the end of the second week one of the members of the church offered to double his subscription if the whole amount was raised within the following week. The pastor is Rev. W. H. Mason.

Observe Fiftieth Anniversary—The fiftieth anniversary of the founding of Bay City Westminster church was recently celebrated with special services during which addresses were made by laymen and by the pastor, Rev. Charles E. Marvin. A grandson of Rev. Donald B. Campbell, who as a missionary in 1863 founded the church, gave reminiscences of the early days of the organization.

STUDY MODERN CHURCH METHODS

INDIANA—A profitable conference on business methods in church work was held at the noon recess of a recent meeting of the Indianapolis Presbytery. Brief addresses were made on the need of system, methods and examples.—The introduction of a new hymnal into Frankfort First church was accompanied by a special evening musical service in which all the hymns and anthems were from the new book. Rev. H. L. Crain is pastor.

Offers Work for Brotherhood Men

Secretaries of the brotherhoods of various denominations recently joined in a letter to the men of American churches urging active participation in the plans for the united missionary campaign. It is suggested that the men can be specially useful in persuading others to attend the various conferences which are being held, in distributing literature on the movement, and in serving on committees to canvass the local congregations.

Where
he spend
evenings?

There recently appeared in one of the foreign language papers of Chicago a pathetic letter by a young man who had recently come from Europe. On account of his loneliness and isolation he had yielded to invitations to gamble in the back room of a restaurant. He neglected his family across the water and had sullied his honor. When he came to himself he wrote the editor asking how he could live self-respect.

Gambling is a serious menace to the rich or poor of any city. Young men of another tongue than English, whether in city or country, need the support of religious advisers to help them keep in the life which brings no regrets. English speaking pastors and workers can reach only English speaking men. The "coming Americans," shut off from many of the enjoyments of young men of this country, need counsel. To help these young men, thousands of whom land in our states every month, is one of the missions of Dubuque German College and Seminary. We train workers from a score of nations to be moral leaders of their people in America.

Our graduates are at work in many places over the country. Students during the summer seek out foreign speaking colonies and help the new residents in their adjustment to American conditions.

Young men are anxious to enter this service. Friends often ask to cooperate with us in the labor of preparing them for work. We shall be glad to answer your inquiries. Address Dubuque German College and Seminary, C. M. Steffens, D. D., president, Dubuque, Iowa.

NEW HOME FOR CALIFORNIA CHURCH

The history of Presbyterianism in southern California is linked in a peculiar manner with that of Calvary church, Wilmington, which dedicated a new house of worship recently. A Sunday school was organized at Wilmington in 1869 with twelve members and two teachers. The year following the first Presbyterian church in southern California was formed there. The church has had a continuous existence, though for many years it was carried on the roll of presbytery with only one or two members. Among those who did valiant service in times of discouragement should be mentioned Rev. Robert Cleland, who is still an active member of Los Angeles Presbytery. Dr. S. Hall Young was at one time its pastor. The Sunday school had to struggle for its existence, too. At one time four different denominations were represented among its officers and teachers.

Calvary Church, Wilmington, Cal.

Los Angeles Presbytery was organized in this church March 20, 1873. Six churches were represented—Santa Barbara, Ventura, Wilmington, Westminster, Anaheim and San Diego. Santa Barbara and Riverside Presbyteries have since been formed within the original bounds, leaving Los Angeles Presbytery an extent of territory larger than the New England states. Wilmington church is the mother of five Presbyterian churches. The good record of home missions is continued by the present congregation in giving the old building fully equipped to the recently organized church at Wilmington Park, about one mile away.

The present pastor, Rev. Walcott H. Evans, came about six years ago, when the membership numbered fifteen; the Sunday school had an enrollment of twenty. Presbytery hesitated at installing a minister over so weak and unpromising a field. The present membership of the church represents a fivefold net increase; the Sunday school has an enrollment of 120; a young people's Bible class has forty-five; the ladies' aid society fifty. To the sale of land given by B. D. Wilson have been added contributions sufficient to erect the new building at a cost of $8,000 and have it dedicated free of debt. The building is fully equipped, having a two story Sunday school department with individual classrooms about a central auditorium, kitchen, rest room, nursery, and the main auditorium of the church which will seat 400 or more.

FARM SCHOOL HELPS CLERGY

CALIFORNIA—The program for "ministers' week" at the university farm, Davis, attracted much attention. The date of the meeting was Dec. 1 to 5. An invitation was extended to all ministers of every denomination, interested in the moral or spiritual affairs of the open country, to attend as the guests of the College of Agriculture of the University of California. The purpose of the meeting was the improvement of the open country through the increased efficiency of the clergy. Dr. W. H. Wilson was one of the speakers.

Will Build New Structure—Rev. Henry Babcock, pastor of First church, Salem, Ore., has resigned to take effect Dec. 1 to accept a call to the church at Merced. This church is a union of First and Cumberland churches, which makes a strong church of 350 members in a fast growing part of California. One of the first undertakings of the new pastorate will be the building of a new church, on which all are agreed.

Church Cost $18,000—The Church of the Redeemer, Los Angeles, costing with the lot $18,000, was recently dedicated. The main auditorium is flanked on either side by rooms for the use of various auxiliary organizations. The congregation has 250 members. The pastor is Rev. J. D. Habbick.—Mrs. R. E. Beach of Oakland was recently elected chairman of the Mount Hermon Federate School of Missions. Vice chairmen were elected from four cities of the state.

Prints Protests to Russell Articles

The Sioux Falls, S. D., Argus-Leader has been printing a number of protests it has had against the publication of the weekly sermon which the publicity department of "Pastor" Russell's organization sends out in plate form to newpspapers. A recent protest letter came from Rev. W. E. Graham of Dell Rapids church. Lutheran pastors have also been protesting.

Financial Situation

Chicago Banker Sees Relation Between Earnings of Railroads and General Prosperity—Investigation of Meat and Egg Prices in Prospect.

Lack of prosperity of the railroads is put forward as one of the reasons for slackness of business by Byron L. Smith, president of the Northern Trust Company, Chicago. He says that railroads are the greatest purchasers and the largest employers of labor and that restrictions on the railway earning power depresses business. Many financial authorities look for a decided turn, however, at the first of the year. The Western roads are holding their own in regard to the volume of tonnage.

Government Meat Is Cheaper—Announcement that the United States navy had bought Australian fresh and corned beef at a lower price than is possible to ordinary consumers from American packers has brought forward a demand by congressmen for an investigation of the conduct of meat packers and especially the relation of cold storage to the price of meat and eggs.

Americans Best Auto Buyers—The fact that England, the largest European maker of automobiles, last year manufactured only 20,000 cars against 185,000 made and sold by one American company alone shows the development of that industry in this country. The Wall Street Journal estimates that all of Europe has only a quarter as many cars in use as has the United States, where the total is estimated at 1,000,000. Large numbers of American cars are in use in most European countries except Germany.

Value of Crop Is Large—Despite the corn crop of Kansas, which was the smallest since 1874, the total value of all agricultural products of the state this year was the largest on record, $242,000,000. These figures were issued recently by the state agricultural authorities.

Want to Earn $5?—Announcement of an offer of The Continent for $5 each for letters from three different persons is made in the advertising columns of this issue. The Continent wishes to tell readers of some successful investments by a minister and by a woman, as well as plans of saving in relation to children by a parent.

Rail Accidents Increase—An increase of 124 in the number of railway accidents and an increase in the number of killed and injured is reported for the year. The increase in accidents largely resulted, it is said, from poor equipment or roadbed. Narrow skirts of women contributed to a number of accidents in connection with trains.

Style Changes Increase Living Cost—A constant element in the high cost of living is brought to the fore in the suggestion of shoe manufacturers that if the public would be satisfied with fewer style changes each year the price of shoes could be reduced. The United States is the only country where fashions in shoes change annually or more often. An effort is being made to find a cloth or imitation substitute for leather in shoes, but the substitute soon loses shape and appearance. The change in styles of automobiles and other manufactured products, including clothes, has much to do with increasing the living expenses of the nation.

FIGHT SABBATH DESECRATION

The first annual convention of the midwest district of the Lord's Day Alliance was held in Greeley, Colo., Nov. 6. Rev. Jesse Penny Martin, Ph. D., was elected president; Rev. James P. Hutchison of Colorado Springs general secretary and treasurer. Vice presidents for the three states represented in the alliance are C. B. Wilcox, D. D., for Colorado; R. B. A. McBride, D. D., Leavenworth, for Kansas; Rev. J. R. Millin, Oklahoma City, for Oklahoma.

The report of Mr. Hutchison showed that he had traveled over 10,000 miles during the year, spoken 180 times in public meetings and has spoken each Sabbath for nearly three years. Direct results of this effort are the closing of about fifty second or third class post offices on the Sabbath and closing of pool halls and stores. Reports show that some of those released from labor on the Sabbath are now teaching in Sabbath schools at the hour they had to labor previously and many have united with the church.

ONE PLAN TO PUSH BENEVOLENCES

The executive committee of Mankato Presbytery has evolved a definite plan of arousing the interest of all churches in the every-member canvass plan. At a recent meeting at Luverne, Minn., under the direction of Rev. A. H. Carver, chairman, churches of presbytery were divided into six groups under the care of a pastor who will lead conferences to stimulate interest in the campaign. The program outlined for each of these meetings contemplates an evening address one day and a meeting morning, afternoon and evening on the second day. The plan of the missionary campaign and the advantages of systematic benevolence will be thoroughly considered. Discussion of Bible school methods will also be included.

not defeat but victory, for there at the specific spot where Satan did his very, very worst, there, even there, God did his very, very best. All ill—well! All bad—good! And the very worst, the very best!"

So, even so, do they talk—not about the defeat, but about the victory of Calvary. Yes! they see deeper than we do.

Race Questions Eliminated by Impartial Gospel

When I meet one of these African men before he is converted, he accepts my Bible but begins to upbraid me because I am one of the spoiled and petted children of a pampered civilization. I—who am I but one of the mob that has all the good things, and there they are out on the edge of the marshes, and they have nothing of the nice things? Speak about "the Book," and he always hits back by saying, "We have no Bible, what is the good of reading it to us?" Finally he winds up with the everlasting "I-am-black, you-are-white" kind of taunt. But this, as preacher, is the very thing I want and must have—I mean the real, rousing rebellion of the real man. I don't want mealy mouthed hypocrisy. It is splendid tactics to draw the enemy's fire and give these fellows a fair chance to out with it all. Well, after this whine, "I am black and you are white," he drives me into a tight corner, for he gets hold of that most difficult subject, heredity. Then comes the old singsong of determinism and he shows how one man who is a tippler begets a son and he is a tippler and so on ad infinitum.

How that tragedy perpetuates itself, even as Adam begat a son in his own image. Then he gushes out the handicaps of life so vividly and virulently that you would all have become Calvinists in two ticks! Oh, yes, he is getting me into a corner. And I of course am allowing him to put me into the candid corner because it is all truth, tragic, tremendous truth. How can a paltry bit of blood-bought dust hurl itself against the bosses on the shield of Omnipotence? Yes, "Right you are, Son of the Dust" (their tribal name this!). Adam only begat a son in his own image, and like father like son, some are born with incipient lunacy or drunkenness or depravity unto the third and fourth generation.

Then cometh anticlimax. For I opened my book at John 3:16, and showed him how God abundantly and astoundingly admits it all, but he does so with one royal reservation. I mean that he is going to wind up the old and begin a new. Hence the glorious fiat, "You must be born again." Born high or born low, born rich or born poor, ye must be born again and there is a fresh start for the whole world! Oh, fragrant fresh start! It is wonderfully invigorating to preach this gospel of the second chance. If you do not admit the need of it you are a juggler. What a fine finish to the color question! Not the old born-from-beneath brother, but a being born from above.

This stops the man who moans about being born of "a weak willed stock." He can now draw upon all the heavenly advantages of his new heavenly heredity just as formerly he could only count on the dark, damning heredity of a depraved ancestor.

SHOW APPRECIATION OF MR. STELZLE

As is well known, the Home Board exercised its utmost persuasion to prevent Rev. Charles Stelzle from leaving his position with the board as superintendent of the bureau of social service. The board failed in this effort, but it has put on record in written form its appreciation for Mr. Stelzle. Among other words of approbation the board says:

"Mr. Stelzle brought to the service of the board unique talents. Providentially prepared by his birth and upbringing to interpret the church to workingmen, and workingmen to the many in the church fellowship who did not understand their interests or point of view, he led the way through our department of church and labor for other Protestant communions, as well as our own, in a new and more sympathetic approach to the working classes of this country, and particularly to those identified with the labor unions. He constantly addressed large audiences of workingmen, spoke weekly to many thousands of them through his articles in the labor papers, established fraternal relations between their federations and representatives of the churches and made careful studies of the religious significance of their social and economic problems. Mr. Stelzle devoted much time to questions of church efficiency and under his leadership the board undertook the task of making surveys of various fields in order to provide the churches with an intelligent grasp of their problems. He organized the department of immigration and was its first superintendent and later the department of church and country life was an outgrowth of his work. He had a genius for publicity and succeeded in getting home mission matters in the press of the country. Labor Temple, now carried on under the Presbytery of New York, is due to his initiative. While we regret exceedingly that his immediate connection with our board is terminating, we rejoice that he continues his work as a minister of our church and that he is giving himself to enterprises that will benefit all the churches of Jesus Christ; we bid him Godspeed in his mission and assure him of our unfailing interest and affection."

THE CALL TO CHURCH
The ringing of the church bell is a call to worship. As a part of the solemn service of the church, it ought to have such tone and quality as insensibly to influence the mind to higher thoughts. Only the liquid-toned, clear ringing call, sounding upon the air sweetly and melodiously, should be used. Blymyer bells are of that kind. They are durable and cost little. If your bell sounds harsh, your church ought to exchange it for a better one.
Let us send you a catalogue and price list, so you can see how cheaply you can enrich your call to worship. Fifty years experience.

NEWS FROM VARIOUS STATES

Kansas—At a recent Sunday morning service the catechetical class of Highland church was examined before the congregation by the pastor, Rev. L. C. Stumpf.

Oregon—During a recent month there were forty-seven meetings in the church house of First church, Portland, exclusive of Sunday school and other services of worship. The total attendance was 4,706.

Washington—Arrangements have been made by the pastors of Central Washington Presbytery to hold evangelistic services in nearly all of the churches during the winter. Pastors will exchange pulpits and do the preaching.

Oklahoma—An addition, the second in two years, has just been made to Stillwater church demanded by enlarged Sabbath school and growing congregations. The former numbers about 250 in attendance and the latter fills the house at almost every service. The church was greatly helped in spiritual uplift by a week's series of meetings led by Rev. E. B. Surface of Oklahoma City.

Idaho—An acre of ground has been given to the church at Pierce Park, Rev. E. M. Murphy pastor, for the building of a chapel. The gift is from one of the leading members.—Twin Falls church is engaged with three other churches in an evangelistic campaign. A canvass of the city and the surrounding country for two miles revealed the fact that 80 per cent of the people are adherents of the evangelical churches; 5 per cent Mormon and 4 per cent Roman Catholic.

Missouri—The semicentennial celebration of Westminster church, St. Joseph, Rev. D. M. Clagett pastor, was accompanied by the dedication of a tablet to the memory of Dr. Henry Bullard, who was pastor of the church for forty-three years until his death in 1911. The church is the mother and grandmother of other churches in the city and now has 405 members. The building was remodeled last year. Representatives of daughter churches and other neighboring pastors took part in the exercises.

Kentucky—Transylvania Presbytery at its recent meeting overtured General Assembly to continue and to enlarge its department of church and country life of the Home Board. Synod was also asked to suggest to churches of the states the advisability of forming a union of Northern and Southern Presbyterian Churches such as had been effected in Harrodsburg.—The new brick church at Harlan is nearly completed and will accommodate in ample manner both church and Sunday school. Rev. Carl T. Michel was recently installed pastor.—The Cumberland Synod of Kentucky at its recent meeting in Owensboro decided to attempt the construction of a building for the publishing department to be located at Nashville, Tenn.

Montana—The "Props" is the suggestive name of a young woman's society in connection with First church, Lewistown, Mont., where Rev. E. W. Wright is completing his fifth year as pastor. The woman's society has nearly 200 members and has been a large force in raising money for the church. —The new building at Glengarry valued at $2,000 was dedicated Nov. 2. It is largely the fruit of the labors of Student J. E. Jones of McCormick Seminary, who for two summers supplied the church. Rev. George Edwards of Grace church, Great Falls, as Sabbath school missionary organized the Sunday school from which the church grew; Pastor-Evangelist A. B. Hinamyer, whose supervision has promoted the growth of the church, and Rev. Albert Pfaus, who has supplied the church frequently, were at the dedication.

WILL EMPHASIZE CHRISTIAN EDUCATION

For years the church has heard of "Education Day," the second Sunday in February, first named by General Assembly in 1894 as the day on which all pastors should preach on Christian education and urge the importance of maintaining and patronizing Presbyterian colleges. This year "Education Day" is the closing day of what is known as "Education Week."

The Atlanta Assembly decided that the eight days beginning with the first Sabbath in February, 1914, should be designated as "Education Week," the first Sunday to be observed as Young People's Day and Vocation Day, the second Sunday as Education Day and the Thursday between as the Day of Prayer for Schools and Colleges. No new special day was created by this action. It merely emphasized the fact that all these special days, previously appointed, have to do with the development of Presbyterian young people in Christian life and service.

Dr. S. S. Aikman, for some years a successful evangelist of Philadelphia Presbytery, upon the urgency of his friends has entered the larger field of general evangelistic activity.

Edward C. Reeve, D. D., of Clearfield, Pa., church, has declined the call recently extended to him by First church, Washington, D. C. Dr. Reeve has been successful during the four years of his pastorate at Clearfield, the total membership now exceeding 700 and contributions to all benevolent causes have been largely increased.

Wire—Franklin B. Wire, a member of Tremont Presbyterian church, lost his life on Oct. 26 last near Clarksburg, due to an automobile accident. He was born in Wisconsin on April 17, 1854, coming to Tremont, Cal., with his parents when an infant. His mother died when he was only 9 years old. He, with his sister, now Mrs. A. H. Burns of Sacramento, then went to live with an aunt, Mrs. B. Guthrie, who still resides at their home near Sacramento. He married Nancy H. Warner of St. Albans, Vt., on Sept. 13, 1873. The wedding service took place at the Tremont church, California, the place from which he was also buried. Nine children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Wire, namely: Etta M. Rowe and James Elzy Wire of Davis, Mrs. Daisy Hite of Sacramento, Charles Franklin (deceased) and Ray W., Alma G., Clayton B., Genevieve and Florence, who reside at their home in Sacramento. The funeral service at Tremont church was conducted by the Masonic lodge, assisted by the pastor of the Davis and Tremont churches.

J. Brierley RELIGION AND TODAY

By the author of "The Secret of Living," "Studies of the Soul," "Ourselves and the Universe," etc.

This is a book to put into the hands of those who may be tempted to think that science and modern thought and modern theories of social life are supplanting religion. Mr. Brierley is intensely in sympathy with progressive thought; he is eager to welcome every new idea that is true as well as new; and yet he continually helps us to see that there are great eternal verities of human life which survive, immovable, as the very foundation and heart of all that is best and most precious in human life. Price $1.25 net.

BIBLICAL AND THEOLOGICAL

J. Warschauer

THE WAY OF UNDERSTANDING: STUDIES IN THE BOOK OF PROVERBS

By the author of "What Is the Bible?" and "Jesus: Seven Questions." Dr. Warschauer has won a wide reputation as a most brilliant writer on religious questions.

This volume contains a series of studies of practical value on topics like: The Duty of Industry, The Power of the Tongue, The Worth of Wealth, The Medicine of Mirth, The Curse of Meanness, The Problem of Pleasure, The Penalty of Temper, etc.

BOOKS FOR CHRISTMAS

Presents of Permanent Value, to Suit All Tastes and All Purses

In the Beauty of Meadow and Mountain

By CHARLES COKE WOODS

Size, octavo (6½ x 9 inches). Pages, 344. Binding, cloth. Gold top. Price, net, $2.50

As one turns the pages of this beautifully illustrated volume, the world of nature is clothed with ten thousand charms before unseen. The sky is more blue, the flowers more fragrant; one reads with deeper understanding and with new joy in life.

Christ and the Dramas of Doubt

By RALPH T. FLEWELLING

Size, 12mo (5 x 7¾ inches). Pages, about 270. Binding, cloth. Gold top. Price, net, $1.00

An especially interesting and helpful study of the world-old problems of evil. A careful and discriminating treatment of Job, Hamlet, Faust, and others, leads in the end to a satisfying view of Christ as the ultimate solution of all doubt and evil.

The Master Secret

By ALBERT BOYNTON STORMS

Size, 18mo (3⅝ x 6¼ inches). Pages, 180. Binding, cloth. Price, net, 25 cents

A collection of devotional essays, ethically and spiritually interpretative and suggestive. A book through which one looks into life and lays hold upon the heart and substance of things; that makes for vision and for strength.

Morning Prayers for Home Worship

By GEORGE SKENE

Introduction by Bishop Edwin H. Hughes

Size, crown 8vo (5¼ x 8½ inches). Pages, vi plus 373. Binding, cloth. Price, net, $1.50

The beautiful custom of family worship is vanishing all too fast. Here is a book with brief and appropriate Scripture lesson, a beautiful hymn and a simple, sincere prayer for each day in the year. It will be a help in maintaining this service.

Heart Religion, as Described by John Wesley

Edited by JAMES MUDGE

Size, 18mo (3⅝ x 6¼) inches). Pages, 123. Binding, cloth. Price, net, 25 cents

This compilation brings into harmony and unity many of the counsels and spiritual sayings scattered through the journals of John Wesley. The value of these meditations and suggestions cannot be overestimated, and their arrangement in "Heart Religion" is most admirable.

Marching Manward—A Study of the Boy

By FRANK ORMAN BECK

Size, 12mo (5 x 7¾ inches). Pages, 192. Binding, cloth. Price, net, 75 cents

A book about boys written by a man who loves boys and who has lived and worked with them. It is an unusual book, one that will challenge attention, provoke interest, and that will be an effective help to every lover of and worker with boys.

Buffalo Roost

By F. H. CHELEY

Size, 8vo (5¼ x 7¾ inches). Pages, 363. Illustrated. Binding, cloth. Price, net, $1.25

Your boys will want this book, with its dash of adventure, its touch of mystery, its joy of outdoor life in the Rockies. There are beautiful illustrations and the story is strong, clean and altogether wholesome and interesting.

A One-Sided Autobiography

Containing the Story of My Intellectual Life

By OSCAR KUHNS

Size, 12mo (5x7¾ inches). Pages, 236. Binding, cloth. Gold top. Price, net, $1.00

Truly fascinating is this story of a man's book life, "a record," as the author says, "of my own personal experience with the great books of the world's literature." As you love books, read this one.

A Sturdy Little Northland

By T. HAROLD GRIMSHAW

Size, 12mo (4⅞ x 7¼ inches). Pages, 108. Binding, cloth. Price, net, 75 cents

Quite out of the ordinary is this little volume, dealing as it does with the quaint manners and customs of the people who dwell on the bleak and sterile Shetland Islands. The book has a style and charm of its own, and is finely illustrated.

The Life Efficient

By GEORGE A. MILLER

Size, 12mo (5 x 7¾ inches). Pages, viii plus 248. Binding, cloth. Gold top. Price, net, $1.00

In these days life, as everything else, must pass the test of efficiency. The efficient life is here treated with an insight that penetrates to the heart, and with an outlook that compasses the realities of life and work.

The Climb to God

By BISHOP WILLIAM A. QUAYLE

Size, 12mo (5 x 7½ inches). Pages, 275. Binding, cloth. Gold top. Price, net, $1.00

A volume of prayers—tender, intimate pleadings for the deepest experiences of Christianity—set in the inimitable wording of the Bishop. These meditations and sincere petitions overflow with the beautiful spontaneity of devout Christian manhood.

The Men of the Gospels

By LYNN HAROLD HOUGH

Size, 16mo (4¼ x 6⅞ inches). Pages, 98. Binding, cloth. Gold top. Price, net, 50 cents

Twelve men of the Gospels are here portrayed, the characters etched rather than sketched in the conventional way. Men of whom little is said or known are here made vivid and interesting. The book furnishes abundant material for study and discussion.

New Minted Gold

By EDGAR L. MOON

Size, 16mo (4½ x 6¾ inches). Pages, 174. Binding, cloth. Price, net, 75 cents

The golden counsels of the Book of Proverbs here glitter in orderly array. Supplemented by illuminating comment by writers of note, the book is very valuable, and will be most appropriate as a gift book.

Caleb Matthews An Idyl of the Maine Coast

By ROBERT W. McLAUGHLIN

Size, 16mo (4¼ x 6⅞ inches). Illustrated. Pages, 83. Binding, cloth. Price, net, 35 cents.

A little story rare in beauty, charming in style, vibrant with life; redolent with the breath of the pine and tang of the sea. Caleb Matthews is a character to be loved and studied. The book is one to be read, slipped into the pocket, and then taken out and read again. The power of it is not merely in what it says—rather in what it suggests. The fine things of life—the whole of life—are here, and that too in beauty and strength.

THE BLUE FLOWER

By Henry van Dyke

The Blue Flower
Henry Van Dyke

This volume, which includes "The Other Wise Man," is probably the most widely sold and universally beloved of all Dr. van Dyke's books. Its underlying motif is the search for true happiness, as symbolized by the rare and beautiful Blue Flower. We travel in all countries and meet all kinds of men of various periods wistfully seeking for the seemingly unattainable—true inward happiness and heart satisfaction. Most of the tales are deeply poetic in conception and told with that delicate feeling and fresh felicity of style which is at the command of this vigorous and fascinating writer.

BEN-HUR. A Tale of the Christ

By General Lew Wallace

This famous Religious Historical Romance, with its mighty story, brilliant pageantry, thrilling action and deep religious reverence, now makes its first appearance as a 50c popular copyright, and as the demand will undoubtedly be enormous, it behooves you to order at once. It is hardly necessary to give an outline of the story, for everyone is familiar with the "Star of Bethlehem and the Three Wise Men," and the wonderful description of the "Chariot Race" and "Christ Healing the Sick on the Mount of Olives." The whole world has placed "Ben-Hur" on a height of pre-eminence which no other novel of its time has reached. The clashing of rivalry and the deepest human passions, the perfect reproduction of brilliant Roman life, and the tense, fierce atmosphere of the arena have kept their deep fascination.

Around the Shop

"We miss a lot of the good things in life," remarked the Visiting Subscriber, "because we do not take the trouble to discover what has been made ready at hand for us."

"I suppose that old pocketbook you kicked off the sidewalk the other day really had money in it?" ventured the Around-the-Shop Man.

"Nothing of the sort. I'll take a chance on being laughed at and pick up the pocketbook every time. I'd be pretty sure to find the owner, though. No——"

"Oh, yes; your grandfather could have bought the whole loop district of Chicago for a buffalo robe back in the thirties, but the weather was cold and he needed the robe?"

"Who's telling this story, anyway? Just because you have a corner in your paper where you can say what you like and nobody can talk back, you can't take the floor from me. Back in the days when we were boys you didn't have much to say. I can remember the time when nobody was trying to guess who you were—the time, you know, when the school teacher——"

"Er—go back to what you were saying. What about the good things?"

"Well, I was trying to say, if you'd let me, that there was one good thing I missed for a long time because I wouldn't believe it was worth while. I'd always had the impression that a religious paper must be made up of a lot of sermons—some of them mighty good, no doubt—a few learned essays on abstract questions, and a collection of vapid stories and 'fillers' taken bodily from the papers that paid for them. 'None of that kind of paper for me,' I said; 'I'm living right here and now, and not back in 1852.'

"My friend Jones knew that I was wrong—that a religious paper could be made that would interest live people—and he had the courage (and the $2.50) to act on his convictions.

"So a couple of years ago I was informed on a nice little red and green printed card that I was to receive The Continent for a whole year as a Christmas gift. Then the paper came, and just for curiosity, and so that I could show a proper appreciation when I met my friend, I started in to read it——

"Want to stop it? Don't you think I've got $2.50? No, sir, you can't stop it. And what's more, I'm going to show some of my friends what they're missing. That's my way of getting even with Jones. By the way, they've made me an elder in our church now. We've got a great field there, and I tell you——"

But that belongs in another department.

Christmas Handkerchiefs

WE draw our collections from every land that makes handkerchiefs, taking from each country the particular lines in which it excels.

So our fine Embroidered Handkerchiefs are from Madeira, Switzerland and France, the fine lace is from France and Belgium, the handkerchiefs with the laces made on the handkerchief come from Armenia, the plain hemmed and hemstitched and the simpler embroideries come from Ireland—and so on.

Among the popular Holiday lines are—

Hand Embroidered Initialed Handkerchiefs, 25c, 50c, 75c and $1.00.

Hemstitched Handkerchiefs, 15c, 25c, 35c and 50c.

Armenian Lace Trimmed Handkerchiefs, 25c and 50c.

Everybody's Christmas

WHY IS CHRISTMAS SO POPULAR?

The church gave Christmas to the world, and nothing else that the church ever gave has been so eagerly taken by so great multitudes.

The time has come when everybody celebrates Christmas—even “Jews, infidels and Turks.” Not all, to be sure, keep it worthily, for some use it for indulgence and some for display. But the marvel of the day in the large is that so many, otherwise irreligious, do remember Christmas with a very real appreciation of its true spirit—the spirit of giving one's own for the good of others.

The church cannot forbear to ask why and how this is. For the church has a multitude of things which the world should seize in just the same way.

Are the conditions that have popularized Christmas available to popularize other elements of Christianity?

What, in brief, is the universal appeal in Christmas?

Is not the explanation this:

The church has really given Christmas to men—cast it abroad, scattered it in the earth. Its other treasures it has called men to come into its fold and get.

The difference doubtless results unawares from the essential idea of Christmas itself. Who can be exclusive and selfish with the thought of a Saviour who in the guise of a helpless Babe made himself one with the lowliest of humanity?

Whatever pride and bigotry might find to feed on in abstruse doctrines of theology or formal practices of ecclesiasticism, there is surely nothing by which a man can boast himself to be specially favored and chosen when he stands in the presence of that Holy Infancy in the manger of Bethlehem.

No voice of scorn against any other soul of man can be uttered there, nor any claim of superiority for one's self. Such words of conceit or contention die on the lips while the eyes are looking on the spectacle of God's eternal Son condescended to equality with the humblest of mankind.

So the simple thought of lowering privilege and dignity for brotherhood's sake to the level of want and woe, nobody has ever been able to bind up in guarded parcels of ritual or dogma. Instead, this Christmas thought inevitably becomes common property.

And that is no doubt the reason why Christmas today has come to be a gracious minister to masses whom the church has scarcely touched with any other influence.

For the church has never yet quite prevailed on itself to be as free with other elements of its message as it has been with the Christmas message.

Atonement, forgiveness of sins, newness of life, triumph amidst affliction, the immortal hope and so on forth—these divine gifts it has rather hoarded within its own sanctuaries; if any man would have them, the church bade him come inside and get them there.

Moreover, when these holy doctrines have been bandied about among undisciplined men at the cost of caricature and travesty, the church has rather trembled than rejoiced at their “popularizing.’

Yet these truths are no more sacred than the truth of incarnation, which also suffers much travesty. But it is better for men to have some idea of Christmas than no idea; and in the long run they will come the more readily thereby to the true idea.

So with all its other truth—let the church scatter, scatter, scatter, unconcerned for its own credit or advantage. And let it believe that truth still lives in germ at the heart of many a distorted shell.

Nor let there be doubt that the church will prosper in this self-forgetfulness. “There is that scattereth and increaseth yet more.” Truth cherished at the church's own altars will glow the brighter because of truth dispensed outside.

The World

To Check Enormous Expenditures for Armaments

It would seem to be axiomatic that what a majority of the people of a majority of the nations want, and want earnestly, should come to pass. Yet the undeniable fact that the world is tired of militarism, of vast standing armies, of burdensome expenditure for armaments, has not had the effect of checking this tremendous outlay; on the other hand the burdens have been steadily increased. Signs are now beginning to point toward a possible pause in the mad emulation of battleship building. The first lord of the British admiralty, Winston Churchill, lately came forward with a definite proposal for what he called "a naval holiday"— a year's suspension of new naval construction; but his proposal met scant encouragement from German official circles. So Britain's annual budget is larger than ever. Germany's greater naval and military activity alarmed France, and as a result the French government is about to make a new and huge loan—$260,000,000—the largest since the Franco-Prussian war period. This in addition to lengthening the term of compulsory military service for her young men. Japan is building battle cruisers, a new and more costly type of swift dreadnaughts, and the South American countries are imbued with the idea that they, too, must have modern navies. Even New Zealand has a first-class warship for South Pacific waters.

Secretary Daniels, head of our own navy department, has cut $5,000,000 from his total estimates of next year's needs, and still more to the point, he recommends that this country take the initiative—that the President ask Congress to authorize the proposing of a conference of all the powers to discuss a reduction of the heavy cost of the army and navy.

Six weeks ago Congressman Hensley of Missouri introduced a resolution in the house regarding international disarmament, indorsing the naval holiday declaration and requesting the President to use his influence to consummate the agreement suggested by Winston Churchill. Absence of a quorum prevented a vote on the resolution during the special session, but the resolution was discussed on several occasions, and strongly favored by such men as Speaker Clark and Representatives Mann, Slayden, Sisson, Decker, Bartholdt and Sherwood. It was argued that a modern battleship, equipped, now costs $15,000,000, that the naval appropriation has doubled in thirteen years, and that 60 per cent of America's revenues goes to defray the cost of past wars and to prepare for future wars. If the nations of the world should cease naval construction for a twelvemonth their relative strength would remain the same, and meanwhile the United States would save about $50,000,000, Great Britain $60,000,000 and Germany $30,000,000. The money expended for battleships could well be used to prevent floods, to build better schoolhouses and better roads, to improve agriculture and for many purposes to advance the general welfare.

President's Message Is Brief and Pointed

President Wilson's message, which he personally delivered at the opening of Congress last week, was more in the nature of an address than a ponderous message, for it was notably short, direct and pointed, and not overloaded with departmental details nor long, partisan argumentation, as has often been the case with presidential communications. Information concerning the departments he left for department reports, thus leaving his own suggestions and recommendations unobscured. The President's words should be read in full by those persons who wish to keep in close touch with public affairs.

Aside from Mexico, salient features of the message were a demand for early currency reform; a discussion of legislation for rural credits as a means of improving the farmer's financial condition; a statement that the Philippines should have "ultimate," not immediate, independence; an argument for government ownership of railroads and natural resources in Alaska, and a plea for the strengthening of the Sherman antitrust law. On the latter two subjects the President promised further messages. The need of social and economic justice for miners, railway men and sailors was specially called to the attention of Congress in language suggestive of the Progressive party's platform. In closing the President gave warm praise to Congress for its diligence, good temper and devotion to public duty and expressed his own pleasure at having been able to cooperate. In general the press regarded the message as lucid, statesmanlike and masterly.

New Make-Up for National Conventions Urged

Decided changes in the national nominating and convention machinery are desired by President Wilson. He asks in his message for the prompt enactment of legislation which will provide for primary elections throughout the country at which the voters of the several parties may choose their candidates for the presidency without the intervention of nominating conventions. The party gatherings should only declare and accept the verdict of the primaries and formulate the platforms of the parties. A novel suggestion is that the conventions should be made up, not of delegates chosen for this single purpose, but of nominees for the house and senate, senators whose terms have not expired, the national party committees, and lastly, the candidates for the presidency themselves—all this in order that the platforms may be framed by those responsible to the people for carrying them into effect.

It will be noted that the composition of the convention as proposed would leave no room in the conventions for the various big and little political bosses unless they happened to fall within the categories just listed. Something of the kind, the Washington prophets believe, is coming. Mr. Wilson says it is a matter of vital concern, and evidently he wishes to hurry it, but the plan will encounter opposition from adherents of the "state's rights" idea in government and from old-line politicians who understand the inner workings of the present convention system.

When Huerta Drops Out Will Patriots Arise?

On the Mexican situation the President last week spoke calmly and positively and with an undertone of hopefulness which has not been shared by observers in and out of Mexico. He repeatedly refers to Huerta as a usurper and declares there can be no certain prospect of peace until he has surrendered his authority and until it is understood on all hands that such pretended governments will not be countenanced by the United States. "We are the friends of constitutional government in America," says the President; "we are more than its friends, we are its champions." At present Mexico has no government; Huerta has forfeited respect and moral support, little by little he has been completely isolated, every day his power is crumbling. Our policy, then, is "watchful waiting."

When the end does come the President hopes to see constitutional order restored in distressed Mexico—how? "By the concert and energy of such of her leaders as prefer the liberty of their people to their own ambitions." But following the reading of the message the question has been asked and not satisfactorily answered as to whether Mexico has such leaders.

Mexican federals evacuated Chihuahua last week without firing a shot or waiting for General Villa's arrival, thus dealing another blow to Dictator Huerta's prestige. Several of Huerta's generals sent a peace commission to Villa, but fled without waiting for a reply. Mexican refugees continue to swarm into Texas as conditions in their own country become more unbearable. In the capital Huerta's power seemed supreme, though the whole northern half of Mexico has been hopelessly lost to him. But General Carranza has not consolidated the various rebel groups, and even Huerta's collapse would not bring peace.

German Soldiers and Civilians Clash in Alsace

A ministerial and parliamentary crisis arose in Germany last week with startling suddenness, and brought about manifestations of bad feeling toward the army and renewed evidence of the unfriendliness existing between the Alsatians and other German subjects. In the garrison town of Zabern a 20-year-old lieutenant baron, von Forstner by name, stirred the passions of the citizens by a scornful allusion to the Alsatians. The town's residents are said to be strongly French in their sentiments, and their anger which was thus aroused was intensified when the same officer struck down with his sword a lame shoemaker who hooted at him as he passed. Several civilians took up the outcry and the baron ordered his men to charge the crowd. The shoemaker was caught and resisted arrest, whereupon the lieutenant deliberately slashed him on the head. Later von Forstner and three comrades were jeered by school boys, and the officers summoned the guard from the barracks, who charged the crowd which had gathered, and as many persons refused to move twenty-five of them were arrested and confined over night in the barracks. Next day they were turned over to the civil court, which promptly released them. Stringent and apparently absurd measures of repression were taken by the military, such as posting sentries all over the town and arresting respectable citizens. When the lieutenant went shopping he was accompanied by four soldiers who guarded the entrance of the stores while the military trouble-maker was inside.

All this found the stormiest kind of an echo in the reichstag in Berlin. When the ministry was questioned by the Socialist and other deputies, the imperial chancellor, Dr. von Bethmann-Hollweg, usually cold and unemotional, made a passionate defense in explaining the circumstances. The minister of war brusquely declared that a systematic effort was being made to traduce the army officers and that the military authorities would not recede before such opposition. A veritable storm broke loose and the minister was greeted with howls and shouts which drowned his speech. A resolution expressing nonconfidence in the government was passed by a vote of 293 against 54. However, as the German chancellor is responsible to the emperor, Dr. von Bethmann-Hollweg did not announce his resignation but retired for a conference with the sovereign.

Emperor William last Friday ordered the transfer of the entire garrison away from Zabern, and Lieutenant Baron von Forstner, it was predicted, would be tried by court-martial and the colonel would be retired. The governor-general of Alsace-Lorraine, Count von Wedel, at first threatened to resign as a protest against the aggression of the military officials.

French Cabinet Overthrown on Tax Question

France has just passed through a parliamentary crisis and a change of ministry. The government of Premier Barthou was defeated by a close vote in the chamber of deputies last week on the question of whether the new $260,000,000 loan should be subject to taxation or exempt like the present rentes, the government insisting that the tax exemption policy should be continued. The opposition, made up chiefly of the reorganized Radical party and the Socialists, successfully argued that to exempt the new bonds would enable persons investing in them to evade unfairly their share of taxes and create a privileged class. The cabinet, however, labored under the unpopularity caused by its recent extension of the compulsory military service period of three years. Old opponents of President Poincare were also striking at him over the heads of ministry, one of the chief of these being ex-Premier Caillaux.

Peace Plan for Ulster; Arms Prohibited

After all hope of compromise between the Ulster anti-home-rulers and the British government had been abandoned, Premier Asquith in a speech at Manchester last Friday opened the door to a settlement by accepting the terms proposed a few days previously by Sir Edward Carson, the aggressive Ulster leader. Sir Edward had announced as the basis of a possible agreement four points: The settlement must not be humiliating nor degrading to Ulster; Ulster's treatment must be the same as that meted out to other parts of the united kingdom; Ulster must retain the full protection of the imperial parliament; the home rule bill must not be such as to lead to ultimate separation from Great Britain. The premier voiced a hope that free and frank discussion of these lines may bring a cessation of the existing long and embittered controversy.

Simultaneously with this holding out of the olive branch of peace the government brought down its mailed fist. By royal proclamation the importation of arms and ammunition was forbidden. Immediately the customs authorities at Belfast seized a hundred cases of rifles and ammunition. No reason was assigned for the proclamation except that the importation was not deemed "expedient."

Officers of the Ulster volunteer "army" say that 80,000 serviceable rifles, plenty of cartridges and some small field pieces have already been brought in, so the prohibition comes too late to be effective. But if Premier Asquith's peace proposals are acted upon the idea of starting a gun factory in Belfast will speedily be dropped. The fact that the government "means business" but wants peace is the interpretation which the Liberal coalition put upon last week's developments.

Pros and Cons of Woman's Suffrage Presented

Fifty-five suffragists were waiting in Washington as the week opened to present to President Wilson a request that he recommend woman's suffrage in one of his later messages to Congress. The committee appointed by the annual convention of the National Woman's Suffrage Association was made large enough to include one woman from each state and officers of the organization. President Wilson was prevented by illness from meeting the delegation last week. The convention was largely attended and received liberal attention from the newspapers of the nation. Dr. Anna Howard Shaw was elected president and Jane Addams first vice president.

Special effort was made by the convention delegates to induce the rules committee of the house of representatives to establish a standing committee on woman's suffrage, and public hearings were held at which the question was argued at length. The National Association Opposed to Woman's Suffrage also met in Washington at the same time and, headed by Mrs. A. M. Dodge of New York, endeavored to counteract the votes-for-women movement. They told the congressmen that women would lose more than they would gain by the ballot and they denied that the suffrage cause had grown to such proportions as to demand a house committee. Mrs. H. E. Talbot of Ohio even asserted that the antisuffragists represented the views of 90 per cent of the women of the country.

In Illinois and probably in other states candidates for Congress next year will be asked by the organized suffragists whether or not they will work for the submission of a federal constitutional amendment extending the suffrage to women.

The National Anti-Saloon League may also attempt to commit candidates for Congress just as legislative candidates are now pledged in many states. The question which may be asked concerns the national constitutional amendment against the sale of intoxicating liquors.

Mrs. Pankhurst Again Jailed and Released

Mrs. Pankhurst, the veteran leader of the militant suffragists, met with an increasingly cordial reception on her brief American tour and netted the reported sum of $22,500 for "the cause," but on her arrival in England last week she was promptly clapped into jail to serve further time on the three-year sentence which hangs over her. She had formerly gained release by a persistent "hunger strike" and she assumed the same tactics at Exeter, adding thirst, in order, say her followers, to make it the more difficult for the government to prevent her from dying on its hands—a self-imposed sacrifice which would seriously embarrass the Asquith administration. Sunday night she was released on a seven-day license because of her weak physical condition.

The arrest of Mrs. Pankhurst in Plymouth harbor was made with elaborate police precautions and parade. She was taken from the Majestic by officers who boarded the steamship from a large police tug and was landed at a naval pier before the steamship was permitted to dock. A smaller boat chartered by the militants was unable to interfere because of the high seas running.

In revenge the Pankhurst forces rallied for fresh attacks on property, similar to their previous outrages, such as smashing windows, pouring acid into mail boxes and burning houses and other buildings.

Panama Worker Dies; Colonel Goethals's Report

Amid the general spirit of congratulation which has followed the turning of water into the Panama canal, there was a note of sadness last week, caused by the death of Lieutenant Colonel David D. Gaillard at Baltimore. Colonel Gaillard was affectionately known as the "hero of the Culebra cut," and his death was caused by disease brought about by worry and overwork during his seven years of duty on canal construction.

Colonel George Washington Goethals, chairman and chief engineer of the isthmian canal commission, recently submitted his interesting annual report to the war department. The report exhibits the caution which the colonel conjoins to constructive ability, for in it he makes no prediction as to the date for officially opening the Panama canal. The first day of actual operation still depends on the treacherous earth slides of the Culebra cut. While it is true that the presence of water in the cut will retard the slides, yet the water may to some extent develop new slides. The seamy character of the rock under pressure must also be watched, and for these reasons the turning of water into the cut was hastened. No effective way has been found to deal with the slide problem except the bodily removal of large hills. Last year it was thought by geologists that the extensive slides had been conquered, yet at the moment when everything looked most promising 2,000,000 cubic yards of material slid into and closed up the big cut. And again it was dug out.

Senate Passes Hetch Hetchy Bill for San Francisco

The Hetch Hetchy valley bill was passed by the senate Saturday night after a long and hard-fought contest and went to the President for signature, having previously passed the house. It gives San Francisco the right to build a reservoir for water supply in a beautiful valley in Yosemite national park, and for that reason was energetically opposed by the Society for the Preservation of National Parks. However, Gifford Pinchot and other disinterested and well-informed persons favored the bill and denied that the Yosemite would be injured by thus benefiting San Francisco, and their views prevailed in the senate by a 2 to 1 vote.

Continuation Committee Hears Mott Report

The Christian people of Holland showed a splendidly generous hospitality toward the Edinburgh Continuation Committee when it met at The Hague in November. The members of the committee, which represents the comprehensive Protestant foreign mission forces of all Christendom, were virtually the guests of the Dutch nation during their stay, for the entertainment fund which provided for their expenses at one of The Hague's spacious hotels was contributed by persons of the highest social and official station, including above all Queen Wilhelmina herself.

Moreover, the queen, not content with simply a financial evidence of interest, sent the committee members a special invitation to visit her in the palace of Loo, near Apeldoorn. A special train carried the missionary visitors on the three hours' journey from The Hague to the palace, and after luncheon the queen and prince consort received the guests in the royal audience chamber, where, at her special request, Dr. John R. Mott, the chairman of the committee, and Mrs. Creighton of London addressed her in regard to the committee's work and objects. Afterwards at tea Wilhelmina and her husband conversed informally with their guests.

The most significant interest of this 1913 meeting of the Continuation Committee was the report of Dr. Mott and his associate, Sherwood Eddy, on the conferences which they held at its request with missionaries in India, China, Korea and Japan, between November, 1912, and April, 1913. This report was presented in a bound volume of 467 pages. Yet in spite of its size, Dr. Mott, comparing the material presented with the material collected, felt justified in designating the report on its title page as "a brief account of the conference." It is the hope of The Continent in later review to indicate something of the scope of the vast amount of material which this volume comprises.

The discussion of the facts and proposals which Dr. Mott presented as the result of his tour demonstrated that not all obstacles to cooperative action among the Protestant mission forces have yet been eliminated. Divergent conceptions of policy and divergent ideas of organization frequently come to the fore. But the happy circumstance of all such debate was the constantly recurring manifestation of a perfectly fraternal Christian spirit. Where definite agreement of ideas appeared impossible, friendly mutual understanding was sought and achieved. In this spirit the committee felt it needful to define its own view of the function which it has to fulfill, so as to remove all conception that it is aiming to constrain the action of any particular board or missionary force.

For this definition the following resolution was adopted:

> "In the judgment of the Continuation Committee the only bodies to determine missionary policy are the boards, the missions and the churches concerned. It believes, however, that the missionary movement is passing into an era in which missionary policy in any particular area can be rightly determined only in view of the situation in that area as a whole, and in relation to other work which is being carried on. The Continuation Committee is of the opinion that in this situation its function is to serve the boards by placing at their disposal all information accumulated by its special committee, by inviting the boards to come together as occasion arises in order that they may consider in common particular questions affecting more than one board, and by helping them through its special international connections to study missionary problems in the light of all facts."

Reorganization Plan for Home Missions

The Board of Home Missions at New York held on December 4 a meeting of the highest importance, at which was considered thoroughly the report of the board's own subcommittee on reorganization. This committee was constituted early last summer from the six board members who attended the last General Assembly at Atlanta as commissioners from the Presbyteries of New York and Brooklyn, together with the two new members from the central West who were added to the board by the Atlanta Assembly's action—Dr. Edgar P. Hill of Chicago and Dr. W. F. Irwin of Louisville. Dr. William Adams Brown was chairman of the committee.

To this committee were referred all of the recommendations and instructions adopted by the Atlanta Assembly save the one matter of transferring the Labor Temple to the charge of the Presbytery of New York. Preparations for this had been made in advance of the General Assembly's meeting and the transfer was accomplished at the meeting of the board on October 16 last.

In regard to other new policies indicated by the Assembly's recommendations the committee began an extensive study, seeking to interpret the spirit of the Assembly's directions and to ascertain the best means of accomplishing changes indicated thereby without jeopardizing the efficiency of the work. It soon became apparent that to meet the will of Assembly as expressed at Atlanta would involve a number of consequential changes beyond those evidently contemplated by the Assembly's action. Moreover, the time appeared opportune for working out ideas of reorganization which the board itself has had in mind. So the deliberations of the committee came to involve a complete scheme of reorganization, which at the meetings alluded to on the 4th of December was carefully considered by the whole board. After certain amendments it was indorsed in principle for report to the next General Assembly.

This scheme is not ready to present to the public in detail and doubtless will not be made known until it can be offered in the Assembly itself. But it is trusted that it will command the Assembly's hearty approval as a plan broad and fair enough to meet all the criticisms which have been visited on the board in the last year. At the same time it is believed that no supporters of the board will feel it surrenders any useful activity.

Purposes Aimed At in the New Plan

Although details are yet held in confidence within the Board of Home Missions, a statement which Dr. Thompson, the secretary of the board, gave out for publication on Saturday, December 6, indicates in general outline what the reorganization plan for the board's work has in view. He enumerates the objects to be attained as follows:

> "To bring the board into closer relation with the field by securing the appointment of a secretary with headquarters on the field who shall have general oversight of all work of the board in the territory now under the field secretaries.
> "To simplify the work by coordinating the departments and bringing them under more definite secretarial supervision.
> "To provide some plan whereby the various sections of the country may be more adequately represented in the counsels of the board. The need of some such provision has long been felt by the board."

In addition Dr. Thompson indicates that certain temporary arrangements of work will prevail until the General Assembly has had opportunity to pass upon the board's new proposals. The vacancy caused by the resignation of Dr. Holt from the district secretaryship on the Pacific coast will not be filled nor will any successor be appointed to take the place of Rev. Charles Stelzle in the bureau of social service. Moreover, the board interprets the Assembly's action in regard to the department of country life as calling for the discontinuance of the department, but not requiring the discontinuance of country life work. Therefore the department loses its autonomy, but its work, as well as the work of the immigration department, will be referred to the immediate secretrial oversight of Associate Secretary McAfee.

Considering Unity and Cooperation

The committee on reference and council of the Foreign Missions Conference has called for January, 1914, another general conference of missionary leaders like to the conference on China which it held in January, 1912, and the conference on Latin America which it held in January, 1913. For 1914 the topic for consideration will be cooperation and promotion of unity in foreign mission work. The first meeting will be held Monday morning, January 12. The sessions will continue until 5 o'clock on Tuesday afternoon. Addresses will cover in succession four divisions of the general topic —survey of present conditions, limitations and difficulties, international aspects and unifying influences. The latter theme will appropriately have the most attention and under this head will be considered the interdenominational agencies, the common religious experience of humanity, the fraternal interchurch feeling on the mission fields, the demand of the mission task for the united effort of all mission forces, the Spirit of the Lord, communion and prayer, fundamental truths held in common and the growth of the spirit of unity at home. The addresses Monday evening on international aspects will be delivered by Professor Warneck of Germany and John R. Mott. Mr. Mott will explain the work of the Continuation Committee. These meetings will be held on the eighth floor of the Presbyterian building and Dr. Arthur J. Brown, the chairman of the committee in charge, will preside.

The Strength of a Great Orator

THERE is a widespread feeling that the power of the modern pulpit is being endangered by the pressure on our ministers to become administrators and factors in all sorts of reform movements. When a minister was installed in a new church and announced that he was not a "reformer" but simply a preacher of the gospel, he was quite taken to task in public and private as being untrue to his great commission from Christ. But most of us will be sympathetic with his obvious meaning. It is a good time to lay renewed stress on the value of great preaching—something that shall correspond in our day to the great oratory of an earlier day.

Probably no man in recent British history has had larger influence as a mere speaker than John Bright, unless it was Gladstone. Yet Bright has higher place, for whatever he did was by his words; his office-holding was unimportant. This man, with others, moved England by eloquent pleading on platforms and by the roadside, toward every great movement of its modern life. Young ministers, who covet some like power in their pulpits, will find the new "Life of John Bright," by George M. Trevelyan, most stimulating. If we do not misread that striking story, four traits appeared in Bright's public speeches which are available for the commonest man.

First, there is the sense of a great cause. He set himself no petty tasks, where twaddle would be endurable. He thought in terms of masses of men and of their deepest needs. Makeshifts were proposed for remedies; he would have none of them. He may have been mistaken at times; that does not matter. He was always putting himself into movements that were big enough to keep him thinking and speaking in big terms. And surely ministers of the gospel enjoy this same advantage. They have a great message. Let them use it greatly, thinking in large terms, eschewing petty topics which end nowhere because they begin nowhere. Like all of Bright's causes, theirs is a cause of the whole people, whose success will mean new life and power for all men. They have no time for trivial pettinesses. They have serious business; let them keep to it.

Secondly, there appears always a deep conviction. Bright was terribly in earnest. He was a Quaker and did not believe in war, but it was said of him that if he had not been a Quaker, he would have been a prize-fighter. He willingly took the unpopular side of things—not stupidly, but in hope that he might help to make it the popular side. Then he followed his course steadily. Recall his familiar retort: "The Times says I repeat myself, that I am always saying the same thing. What I complain of in The Times is that it never says the same thing." Bright had no harp of many strings, except as he played the same theme with many variations. He stood in absolute awe of the convictions that had grown in him; disloyalty to them was treason worse than disloyalty to the queen. He could face an unfavorable parliament or public without tremor: "There is on earth a yet auguster thing, veiled though it is, than parliament or king. That auguster thing is the tribunal which God has set up in the consciences of men. It is before that tribunal that I am now permitted humbly to plead, and there is something in my heart—a small but exultant voice—which tells me I shall not plead in vain." Do not our ministers covet that assurance? Are they mistaken who insist that the pulpit of today lacks the mighty note of conviction and has taken on the note of hesitation? Shall not our men think out their messages until they are assured beyond doubt? Then they must speak with power.

Thirdly, there appears a wholly unselfish purpose in Bright's speech. He wanted nothing for himself. He deliberately stood in his own light. He heard that some one had said that he would have been in the cabinet if it had not been for his principle of peace at any price. Scornfully he flashed back: "As if office could compensate a man for the guilt of participation in this war!" After a famous speech in parliament, Disraeli told him he would give anything he had ever had to have made that speech. Bright replied, "Well, you might have made it if you had been honest." He often said that the trouble with Disraeli lay in his own saying, "We come here [to parliament] for fame." Is there any more subtle peril for a man in public life, whether in the ministry or out of it? And can anything more certainly cut the nerve of power for a man who is preaching the gospel of self-denial?

Fourthly, all this was gathered up in his speaking into a marked simplicity. He had his eye always on the common people. He talked in parliament much as he talked by the roadside. His words are simple, his vocabulary rich enough but never ornate, his figures those that fitted the lives of his hearers. He spoke to be heard, not to speak. His preparation was careful without being slavish. His closing paragraph was almost always written in full and carefully mastered, so that he went into no foolish flights of extravagance at the end of his speech, was never carried away with his own oratory, and never failed to make the point which was most important to make. Yet his simplicity, like that of most Quakers, was only another term for dignity. There was no cheapness about him, nothing that we call "playing to the gallery." His mission was too high and his message too noble to be cheapened by the appeal of the moment. Need we emphasize the importance of this trait of great oratory? If we are to have an increased number of men whose very presence shall mark the pulpit, they must be men who have learned this secret of blending dignity with simplicity.

Christmas Day

O day of days, that brought the Christ to earth,
With heaven's peace men's burdened hearts to fill,
What glory crowned thee in his holy birth!
How deep the love and joy that greet thee still!

Not now, 'tis true, is heard thy triumph song
From angel choirs filling all the sky;
Yet children's voices those sweet strains prolong,
And hymn again thy blest supremacy.

No shepherds in a gladsome maze today
Acclaim thy manger-cradled Babe a King.
Yet see—uncounted millions own his sway;
Their praise of thee from every land doth ring.

O day of days, bestow thy peace on me!
Attune my heart to sing the angels' song!
In thy young Child may I my Saviour see,
My Lord, to whom my love, my life belong.

HOWELL MERRIMAN HAYDN.

A Prediction About Next Thanksgiving

The criticism visited on President Wilson for attending Roman Catholic mass in Washington on Thanksgiving Day doubtless includes elements which a broad-minded Presbyterian would instantly spurn. We fear that some at least who have joined the objection believe that a Protestant ought never to go to Roman worship. But of course, the President would not think that nor any other generous gentleman. It will do any man good occasionally to attend divine service in a church other than his own—indeed, very much different from his own. Even though he may find himself unable to value for his own spiritual edification the ceremonials observed there, he will respect them as the means by which others find their access to the heavenly Father. And his spirit will be broadened and freshened by the sympathy of realizing in his neighbors, spite of all differences, a common devotion to their common Lord.

But the President has, we trust, observed in the protests reaching him, a note deeper and more sober than this and much more worthy of his attention. The jealousy which the Protestant ministers of Washington expressed was, as The Continent understands it, not jealousy of the Catholic rector in Catholic St. Patrick's, but jealousy for the American principle of government impartiality among churches. To this principle President Wilson is certainly the last American who could be indifferent. And although it would be absurd to imagine that the government's religious impartiality would be compromised if on one occasion the President attended Roman Thanksgiving mass, does Mr. Wilson not perceive that the matter has a quite different aspect when successive Presidents on successive Thanksgiving Days thus attend a Roman mass, accompanied by many of the highest officers of the government in each case? That is the actual circumstance with which current criticism deals.

The annual Thanksgiving proclamations of the Presidents customarily intimate, as President Wilson's own proclamation did, the expectation that the people will in general meet for Thanksgiving services in the places where they worship habitually. As the whole festival has become a home festival, its genius seems specially to call for the return of thanks to God in the church homes of the respective worshipers. The atmosphere of the day therefore would be more harmoniously kept by the government leaders at Washington if, instead of going in an official body anywhere, they betook themselves severally with their families to their ordinary places of church attendance. And assuredly they ought not to permit a tradition to grow up which would seem to make any one church in Washington the ostensibly official church of the government, which even for one day of the year it is a public duty for them to attend.

But The Continent anticipates President Wilson's tact will in due time find a way to brush aside all appearance of official recognition for any church in the national capital—and that without offending the proper sensibilities of Catholic citizens. Having already proved by his presence at this one Thanksgiving service that he realizes himself the President quite as much of Catholic as of Protestant Americans, and having shown perfect respect to Catholic worship, Mr. Wilson will no doubt next year quietly choose for himself some Thanksgiving service which represents his own personal preference in religious custom. That will end all this talk of the "official Thanksgiving" and everybody will be as happy as before.

Little Atheists Rule a Public School

It is a sinister story which comes out of Brooklyn—the story of a group of boys and girls in eighth grade of public schools who refused in morning exercises of their schoolroom to sing any songs which referred to God. And the still more sinister note of the story is the supplement which states that the children had their way about it; the school authorities ordered all songs dropped which had any religious suggestion in them. The children—astoundingly precocious atheists—said callously that they didn't believe any longer that there is a God and so they were not going to sing about him.

Could anything more startlingly exhibit the pass of peril to which the country has brought itself by stupidly letting go of morals and religion in the public schools in order to protect the schools against sectarianism? It hasn't protected them certainly against the worst sectarianism—the ignorant bigotry of the atheist. Does anybody imagine that a generation of such boys and girls who do not believe in God could grow into citizens fit to carry out the destiny of the republic? Self-perpetuation alone makes an imperative reason why the nation must teach its children that God makes them responsible to him for the lives they live and the deeds they do in the world. The necessity grows so unmistakable that soon even the most blinded of sectarians will see it, and then they'll no longer be able to see the danger of harm to their own peculiar creeds which now worries them so greatly.

Everyday People Cashing Up for Theology

The Continent does not believe there has ever been before just such an example of money-raising for a theological seminary as the popular subscription campaign in Pittsburg which has just brought to Western Seminary in that city $130,000 of new cash resources out of which a new administration building and a new chapel will be put up. Colleges are sometimes financed by sending committees out along the streets of their own towns and asking every business man encountered to "chip in." But the idea has been that theological seminaries are so distant and severed from the common man's interest that none but special persons with a peculiar turn of mind and a great lot of money could be expected to give to their support. But the friends of Western have taken another cue and come out vindicated for their audacity. They have asked all sorts of men to give for theological education and all sorts of men have responded generously—and all of this done right in Pittsburg itself, which, to say the least, is not a city abnormally concerned for religion in either its practical or intellectual aspects.

It is a fine transaction all the way around—something for all church folks to be glad of—an affair suggesting possible popularity for theology hardly dreamed of hitherto. The circumstance will bring the seminary nearer the people and the people nearer the seminary. And that is mutual good.

Introducing Pete McCarthy, Barber

The Joliet News in Illinois reports that "the largest factor for good living" in that thriving city of 35,000 souls is Pete McCarthy. And who, pray, is Pete McCarthy? A barber, says The News, and besides that, the inspiring spirit of Morning Star mission. Pete is a wonder for the way he loves folks and especially down-and-out folks. That is the reason why after work hours he strikes out along the sidewalks looking for "the man hanging about the streets at night, sick at heart, with no money, no lodging and little clothing." What happens when Pete meets up with such a specimen of discouraged humanity The News tells thus:

> "As to whether the man is deserving or not, sick or well, drunk or sober, religious or a criminal, McCarthy asks no questions, but takes him in, cleans him up, feeds and warms him, all from his own small salary, and then talks religious business so directly, so simply and understandingly, that hope is put into the heart of the despairing. Ninety per cent of those who kneel at the Morning Star mission remain true and faithful."

Not only has McCarthy thus reached a host of the degraded, but his converts and now his helpers include some well-to-do citizens who never were much impressed with religion till they met this barber. And the business men of Joliet have decided that he ought not to pay for all of his helpfulness out of his own pocket. They have just been raising a fund to support his work. When they began it, they asked Pete up to speak to the Commercial Club at dinner. He was as direct and simple there as with his drunkards in the mission.

"Every morning on my knees," he said to the merchants, "I ask the Lord to give me a soul that day. He doesn't fail. Every month I have more converts than there are days in the month."

—William W. Smith of Poughkeepsie, New York, who made himself a millionaire by selling the boxes of cough drops on which his picture appears prominently, was a steadfast Presbyterian elder in that city, and his recent death is a great loss to the church as well as to the Young Men's Christian Association. Toward both church and association, as well as to many other forms of benevolence, Mr. Smith was very generous with his wealth, and felt a profound sense of Christian stewardship. The quality of the man is indicated by the fact that when he first set up in the confectionery business he found himself in competition with concerns that did business on Sunday, and the look of the situation was that he would have to go to the wall unless he, too, used the money-making opportunities of Sunday. But the young merchant grimly said to himself that he could fail if necessary, but he would not break the Sabbath. To that resolution he stuck invincibly. In later life he declared that his financial prosperity dated from the moment that he definitely fixed this resolution in his conscience.

—The comfortable old proverb "To err is human" often solaces The Continent's rueful contemplation of its typographical trespasses. But no proverb suffices to cover the chagrin of one singularly unhappy blunder in the editorial remarks of last week concerning the new Fourth church edifice in Chicago. As printed, the last paragraph of those observations charged up to Pastor Stone and his coworkers the imbecility of offering a reward for criticisms of their building work. Of course, they couldn't be so foolish. The editorial thought really intended was that they might offer such a reward without peril of having it taken. The verb "might" was the rascal that caused the mischief by its mysterious disappearance. But perhaps the editorial mind is really to blame for venturing on an expression of its thought a shade too bizarre. Just to say that this new church building could hardly be made better or more complete would have been a safe fashion of telling the fact.

—The Continent confesses to hearty sympathy with a correspondent who writes her strenuous objections to Santa Claus cantatas offered for Sunday school use at Christmas. "Santa on a Strike" and "Santa Santaplane" seem to this good lady quite beyond the limit of toleration. We suppose no Christian parents in these days are so strait-laced as to object to the folklore of Santa Claus (when it is taught as folklore and not as fact) for the children in the home, but even in the home the memory of the sweet reality of the Christ Child ought to dominate all else. And in Sunday school, as a department of Christ's own church, all the singing at least should certainly be of Jesus and the "little town of Bethlehem."

—The little Red Cross Christmas seals are beginning to appear on current mail matter again, and no token of the season of good will is more inspiring. Every one of these stamps bespeaks a sympathetic memory for the sufferings of tuberculosis victims which must brighten both the heart from which it springs and the lives to which it reaches out.

—The less religion one has himself, the more particular he is as to its quality in others.

The Shepherd's Story

By J. Ritchie Smith

THE morning meal is ready, for the Shepherd will be hungry when he returns from his long watch in the field. Mary goes again and again to the door, and shading her eyes with her hand looks down the winding path to see if he is coming. The children grow impatient, for the hour is late. "Mother, may we not eat?" said Andrew. "Not yet, my son, your father will soon be here. While we are waiting I will tell you of something strange that befell me last night.

"As I lay upon the bed, I thought of your father, and wondered if he were warmly clad, for the night was cold. Then I began to think of the promises of God, and to ask why they were not fulfilled. Has God forsaken his people? Has he forgotten to be gracious? Such doubts perplexed and troubled me, and I could not sleep. And as I tossed restlessly about, suddenly the room was filled with light. I rose quickly, and went to the door, and looked out. The heavens were all ablaze, and as I looked and wondered I heard a burst of music that seemed to fall from the skies, full and sweet and clear as the harmonies of heaven. Then the music ceased, the light faded away, and I saw nothing but the lonely plains. Perhaps your father may tell us what it means. See, he is coming."

The children set off in a merry race to meet him. As he drew near, Mary saw a light upon his face as if the radiance of the midnight sky still lingered there. "I have seen strange things," he said; "sit down, and I will tell you." And as they gathered eagerly around him, even the children forgetting their hunger, he began his tale.

"We were keeping our flocks as usual last night, Reuben and Simeon and James and the rest; and as we watched we talked. At first we spoke of everyday matters, of our homes, our children, the care of the sheep. Then a strange solemnity seemed to settle down upon our spirits, and we began to talk of sacred things. The eighth psalm came to our minds as we turned our faces toward the stars, and we thought of the greatness and the goodness of God.

"Presently Reuben asked the question that presses upon many hearts, 'Why does not God visit his people? He has not spoken to us for centuries. Not since the days of Malachi has the voice of a prophet been heard in Israel.'

"'But,' said John, 'though we have no prophet we have the promises. And the Christ is to be born here in Bethlehem, Micah tells us.' We turned with one accord, and looked long and wistfully upon the little town that lay upon the hillside above us. 'Yes, but it may be centuries before he comes,' said Simeon, 'and where shall Israel be then?' 'Where it has always been, in the hand of God,' John replied. 'We are his people, and the sheep of his pasture, and he watches over us as we watch over our sheep.'

"Then some one in a low voice repeated the twenty-third psalm, The Lord is my Shepherd. 'Isaiah says the Messiah shall be like a lamb,' said Reuben, 'but that I could never understand.' As I listened my heart burned within me, and I cried, 'Give ear, O Shepherd of Israel, Thou that leadest Joseph like a flock; Thou that sittest above the cherubim, shine forth.'

"And even as the words were upon my lips, the skies were opened above us, and the glory of heaven shone round about us. We were afraid, and hid our faces in our hands, for who may look upon the glory of God and live? And while we wondered and feared, a voice sounded in our ears, saying unto us, 'Be not afraid; for behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all the people: for there is born to you this day in the city of David a Saviour, who is Christ the Lord. And this is a sign unto you: Ye shall find a babe wrapped in swaddling clothes, and lying in a manger.' And we lifted up our eyes, and lo, an angel stood before us. And as we looked, there was a burst of music in the air, and we saw the host of heaven, and heard them chant a song of praise, 'Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace among men in whom he is well pleased.' Then the voices ceased, the vision vanished, and we were alone.

"We looked at one another in silent wonder, but we were no longer afraid. Even the sheep, silly, timid creatures as they are, were not frightened, but stood motionless, as if they were still listening to the angels' song. And I thought, 'We men are afraid of God because we are sinners. These innocent creatures do not fear him.' And the word of the angel came to my mind, a Saviour. Then all together we cried, 'Let us now go even unto Bethlehem, and see this thing that is come to pass.'

"The little town lay quietly sleeping as we drew near, for it was long before the rising of the sun. Said Simeon, 'Alas that the Son of David should be cradled in a manger! How then shall he deliver Israel?' And no one of us could answer him, for we did not understand how it could be. But after a while John said, 'The sword has failed; perhaps God will try some other way.' When we reached the town, James asked, 'How shall we find the manger where the child lies?' And Reuben answered, 'Let us go first to the inn and see if he is there.' We came to the inn, and sought the stable, and found it in a cave.

"An old man with long beard and kindly face met us at the door, and said, 'I am Joseph, the carpenter of Nazareth,' and bade us enter. We told him in a few words of the angel's message and the song of the heavenly host, and asked to see the child. 'Enter,' he said, and led us to the manger. Beside it sat Mary his wife, the light of mother love upon her face, as she bent above her firstborn son. Yet there was wonder and awe in the look she turned upon the babe, as if she saw in him more than met the eye. He lay wrapped in swaddling-clothes, so tiny, so weak, so helpless, that I said in my heart, 'Can this be the Christ?'

"But as I gazed upon him, there fell upon me such a sense of the presence of God that I dropped upon my knees beside the manger, and tears ran down my face. I thought within myself, that love brought him to this manger; and I worshiped him. We were all kneeling before him, when Mary said, 'He is the Son of the Highest, Whose name is blessed forever.'

"But, father," said Andrew, "we are taught, 'Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and Him only shalt thou serve.'" "Yes, my son, and we read in the prophet Isaiah, 'Unto us a child is born, unto us a Son is given; and the government shall be upon his shoulder: and his name shall be called Wonderful, Counselor, Mighty God, Everlasting Father, Prince of Peace!' I worshiped God in him.

"Then we rose from our knees and left the room. The day was breaking, and the people were beginning to move about the streets. To all we met we told the story of the night. Some mocked us, and said we had fallen asleep and dreamed. But most of those who heard were filled with wonder, and soon the town was all astir, and men were talking of the babe, and questioning if he could be the Christ. And I hastened home to tell you."

"I wish I could see the dear little baby," said Ruth; "I should love to take him in my arms." "We shall all see him some day, I hope," said the father. "Now let us praise God for the gift of his Son." And from the law and the prophets he read the predictions of the Christ and rendered fervent thanks to God that with his own eyes he had seen the promises fulfilled.

THE CALL TO SERVICE

Dr. Grenfell Aboard One of His Boats

BY WILFRED T. GRENFELL

THIS IS AN AGE of awakening intellect. Even down here in Labrador men are waking up and refusing to submit to propositions and conditions they once bowed beneath. It is almost an age of suspicion, with capital and labor, governed and governing. It is an age of accumulated speed in evolution and the remedy that is to reach home and overwhelm opposition must be adapted accordingly. Men listen to what the parson or leader of any kind says; they criticise more and more what the parson does.

A small sailboat has just gone by as I write. It has a ten horsepower kerosene engine, and is constantly cruising from place to place along this rough and lonely coast. The grimy-looking individual in overalls driving her is the parson. He cannot afford a yacht's crew; and the comments on him are: "There be somet'ing to dat parson—he does t'ings." Of course he does not escape criticism; there are still a few unco' guid who prefer a white collar to a horny hand, and alas! their tongues are no kinder than the rest on that account. But the virile folk are always interested in doing things. That "deep calls to deep" is no new discovery and nothing so commends the service of Jesus Christ to young manhood as the fact that it does things, and calls on them also to do things and make sacrifices also. I have in my cabin specimens of various tracts, genuine efforts no doubt to attract men to Jesus Christ. They are sent out from time to time, often in large numbers. I received once a complement of 10,000 of one single variety, a heavy load to carry and quite impossible to distribute, the very gift signifying impracticability. The whole appeal of many of these is "Nothing to do; only believe." "No cross for you to bear, no struggle to carry, no defeats to suffer, no working out your salvation with fear and trembling. Only an intellectual process, momentary and easy."

What Christ and Manhood Want

As a remedy for indifference to church-going this mental submission, if once accepted, is obviously valuable. And I am witness to scores of lives saved by that combination. But I am certain that the permanence of the result depends not on the mental process but on the continuous association with the church and its environment. And further that it will develop the abounding life in the individual only as the church is itself "doing things." Fortunately that is what Christ wants and at the same time what manhood can rejoice in. The appeal that by believing we may verily escape the righteous punishment of our wrongdoing is a mean one anyway, and the resulting faith is too often of that sickly variety that we surgeons frequently see. "When the devil was sick the devil a saint would be; when the devil was well the devil a saint was he."

The call to Christ's service to which I myself responded was that of D. L. Moody. Let each man of the thousands who answered it interpret his view as he likes. I understand their mental attitude well enough to have a tender place in my heart for all those who think honestly that the success of that message was "You have only to believe to be saved from punishment." A man who did things and whose permanent monuments of practicality are at Mount Hermon, Northfield, Glasgow, Chicago and elsewhere, can be excused if, like Browning, societies should have to be formed to study his meaning. But to me Moody taught the one and only thing that could have interested me and that was that God Almighty really wanted such work as I could do to help him out. That had never occurred to me. I had thought service as far as God was concerned meant unattractive, conventional gatherings which I loathed and went to sleep in if I could. Thus, to defend a boy who was being bullied against his enemies was sport to me; but that would have been the last thing I should have thought of as being "religious service." That that was a finer means of grace to my soul than the good of books, or the too stereotyped Sunday, had no more been taught me than that the eating of my porridge for my breakfast was. And yet that is a means of grace and to teach that it is so is divine service.

How many hundreds of men, good-natured, honorable, unselfish, in the busy world downtown does one meet who would laugh right out if you said, "I want you to come and preach the gospel with me"—men who would instantly help in any genuine effort to "help others out," enjoy it, jump at the chance of it, and yet will smile again afterward, when you argue that the rendered service was really divine service, was preaching the gospel; and if so why not acknowledge it? For my part I at once recognized it was true, for I felt this was as essential to explain things as was immortality. It gave a dignity and intelligence to life. I had never dreamed that Christ's call was to follow him. The transient joys of meat and clothing and even athletic honors I well knew never satisfied anyone worth while.

However much we owe to the old method of exhibiting the remedies for loss of life we must look at facts squarely; and act just as we doctors do who agree with teachers of religion as to the great value of psychical treatment, and yet differ from the Christian Scientist as to the value of training the leucocytes with vaccines, or even making use of the knife. If we can realize the truth of this—we who work among sailors and fishermen, advocating the claims of the Master on their lives; a body of men as emotional as any in the world, as tender-hearted and unsophisticated as any class anywhere—then how much more must this be true where the childlike nature that responds most readily to sentiment has been hardened and made callous by blatant and shallow skepticism and the bitter experiences of life in big cities?

The service of Christ is the real "service" and the preacher who seeks first to conserve energy and save men's lives for "service" looks not for a community hereafter of men who have escaped punishment, but a world of men now who are rendering the "service of their reason."

To them heaven is a place not merely of men singing because of their escape, but a place of which it can be said that "there His servants serve Him"; religion means not the holding of services but the rendering of them—not a cerebral process so much as a manual one. Is it our hand or merely our brain action God wants?

This was to me Moody's message. And I believed and still believe that it was Christ's. Hundreds of young men from colleges, universities and wealthy homes have paid their own expenses these past years to come and do anything, even dig drains, when it was helpful. More than half my colleagues are volunteers. Men are eager to accept a gospel so satisfying and that gives such zeal to life. They know the hollowness of conventionalities. So I believe in the inspiration of this gospel of the Christ. Why? Because it is such a desirable gospel. It is just exactly what in the bottom of my nature I wanted, and I know it's the same with every man. It is an interpretation about which in my bluest moments of life and in many hours facing death I have never had one single doubt. Just as I want to live again, so I want to believe I am of use while I am alive. And this is the one justification I can find. When things look darkest it has never gone back on me.

Can't All Believe in the Same Way

Yes, friends of other professions, I know we doctors differ. And, in the United States at least, so-called new schools for curing ills are ever being invented and legalized. We cannot expect that all who are sincerely seeking the same end should see as we see as to methods. It is a sorry fact, but we know it to be true, that because we do not all "believe" the same way we have to pray hard to God to help us not to quarrel. Our injector wouldn't feed the boiler the other day and we lay helpless awhile as a result, but we didn't want to smash the pipes up but only to clear out the mud and make it feed better.

When once the ministers of all denominations of a city were good enough to give me a reception and a hearing we sat in a circle around a central fireplace and we all agreed that if there before us were an injured child, a lost man or a fallen woman, we should all rush to help and go about it in much the same way.

In Labrador before we had more than one mail boat and one company transporting passengers to their destination no one arrived so quickly as now, and fewer ventured to travel at all. History, which is the best of evidence, shows that under proper conditions the existence of competing lines seems to have the divine sanction. Parallel lines should not do injury but convey their passengers to a union terminal—which we believe shall be true in the case of the journey to the holy city.

A prominent man cynically remarked to me a little while ago, "Religion is a curse, it exists on separation. The sectarians here hate unity because it would mean an end to their existence. Here, for instance, in one place they insist on having five incompetent denominational schools instead of one good one. Here in politics they won't unite for the best end, only separate for their own." Alas! these statements had a substratum of truth; and such a condition obviously alienates from the cause of Christ those who may be led to think that such are the true interpretations of the Master's message.

The effort to serve is always a uniting influence, and that alone is a strong plea for emphasis on that method of delivery to the world today of the evangel of the Master. Christ's own statement that the little services within the reach of every man are considered as done to himself is the seal and stamp of their being "divine service."

Theologues in libraries, science students in lecture rooms, doctors in divers clinics and worshipers in various churches all learn to accentuate differences. It may yet be centuries before we can all hope to be quite correct. But in the simple following of His footsteps in the doing of exactly what He would do, in the field of loving deeds, we must all unite on pretty nearly the same course. Are we not on one ground in this, that to help a brother is the one sine qua non of divine service? Why make a mystery of the simplicity of religion? It is a truth we find emphasized every day in the great bible of nature, one that meets ever more universal approbation in the revelation to men's opening intelligence.

Catholics Translating Bible Anew

BY HENRY J. WEBER

IT IS A SIGN encouraging and delightful to see Catholic priests putting forth a new English translation of the Scriptures made "direct from the original languages of the Bible." And this bold appeal to Hebrew and Greek over the head of the Latin Vulgate which the Roman Church has made its infallible standard of faith has the church's approbation. It bears the "nihil obstat" of the Roman censor, the "imprimatur" of John Cardinal Farley, archbishop of New York, and is undertaken "with the approval of the cardinal archbishop (of London) and the English hierarchy." Rev. C. Lattey, professor of sacred Scripture at St. Beuns's College, North Wales, and Rev. Joseph Keating, editor of The Month, are the general editors. Both are Jesuits.

The first part translated and published comprises the epistles to the Thessalonians. The text of Westcott and Hort has been made in general the basis of the translation. We note with pleasure that in the critical notes appended such Protestant scholars as Frame ("Introduction"), Deissmann ("St. Paul"), Moulton ("Grammar of New Testament Greek"), Dalman ("Words of Jesus") are mentioned in a perfectly fair spirit. The editors frankly declare: "The great advances made in textual criticism, the light thrown upon New Testament Greek by the Egyptian papyri, and the existence of many needless obscurities and faults in the current version [the Douai], all demand a more accurate translation, if the exhortations of the holy see to a more frequent and fruitful perusal of the sacred writings are to meet with general acceptance.

For evident reasons few attempts have thus far been made by Catholics to translate the Bible into modern English from the original tongues. Roman Catholic fugitives on the Continent published an English version of the New Testament at Rheims in 1582 and the Old Testament followed in two volumes at Douai in 1609-10. But both these translations were based on the Vulgate solely and reproduce its faults and shortcomings. Moreover the added notes are characterized by the controversial spirit of the time in which they were produced. More than 200 years passed before another version was attempted, because according to the canon law the Douai version must be used when the epistles and gospels are read in the Catholic Church.

The first Catholic Bible from the original tongues was published anonymously in 1836 under the title, "A New Version of the Four Gospels, with Notes, etc. By a Catholic." The author was soon known to be Dr. John Lingard, a famous historian. In 1893 Leo XIII. encouraged the study of the original texts and thereby initiated the revival of biblical studies in the Catholic Church. This viewpoint of the holy see probably led an American Dominican, Rev. F. A. Spencer, to issue in 1898 another translation of the four gospels from the Greek direct, with reference to the Vulgate.

Fathers Keating and Lattey announce their new version as "The Westminster version" and have dedicated it to the archbishop of Westminster. They evidently are anxious to appropriate that well-known byword for Presbyterianism to themselves as the true Westminsterians.

The letters to the Thessalonians offer no opportunity for the discussion of the peculiar tenets of the Protestant versus the Catholic Church on repentance as opposed to penance, faith and good works, justification, etc. But these epistles reveal Paul's eschatology. On I. Thessalonians 4:17 the Catholic editors remark: "St. Paul plainly means that the just who are alive at the last day shall pass into glory without dying. Doubtless the tribulation of those days will have freed them from any need of purgatory." They maintain that St. Paul expected that he himself would see the final end! They directly repudiate the Douai translation of I. Corinthians 15:51: "Behold I tell you a mystery. We shall all indeed rise again; but we shall not all be changed," and correctly render: "We shall not all die, but we shall all be changed."

In I. Thessalonians 2:6 where Douai and the revised version have "apostles" this new version prefers "missionaries." Where the Douai version has "charity" these translators render "love." Where the Douai version reads "purchasing of salvation" (I. Thess. 5:9) they render "winning of salvation." The revised reads "obtaining of salvation."

That readers may be able to compare the Catholic version with the authorized or revised version we append here the Catholic text of Paul's greeting (I. Thess. 1:1-10):

"Paul and Silvanus and Timothy to the church of the Thessalonians in God the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ: Grace to you and peace.

"We give thanks to God at all times for you all, making mention of you without ceasing in our prayers, recalling your work of faith and your toil of love and your steadiness of hope in our Lord Jesus Christ before God our Father. We know, brethren beloved of God, how you were chosen, how our gospel was delivered to you not in word alone, but with power and in the Holy Ghost and with full assurance. Yea, you know what manner of men we became among you for your sake. And you became imitators of ourselves and of the Lord, accepting the word amid much affliction with joy of the Holy Ghost, so that you became a pattern to all that believe in Macedonia and in Achaia. For from you the word of the Lord hath been noised abroad, not only in Macedonia and Achaia, but in every place [the report of] your faith towards God hath gone forth, so that we have no need to say anything further. For [those others] themselves repeat concerning us the manner of our entry amongst you, and how you turned to God from idols, to serve the living and true God and to await his Son from heaven, whom he hath raised from the dead, Jesus, who rescueth us from the wrath to come."

Is a brighter day, devoted to closer Bible study, dawning for the Catholic Church?

Slave Trade Active in Morocco

If France accomplishes nothing more in Morocco than the extermination of the slave trade she will have performed a genuine service to humanity. Though slavery has been abolished in every other quarter of Africa, slight attempt has ever been made by the European powers to put a check upon the practice in Morocco, declares Alexander Powell in "The Last Frontier." Something over 3,000 slaves, it is estimated, are imported into Morocco every year, most of them being brought by the terrible desert routes from Equatoria and the Sudan, the trails of the slave caravans being marked by the bleaching bones of the thousands who have died on the way from heat, hunger or exhaustion.

"Many smug-faced people will assure you that slavery has been wiped out in Africa, but I can take you into half a dozen Moroccan cities," writes Mr. Powell, "and show you slaves being auctioned to the highest bidder as openly as they were in our own South fifty years ago. There is a large and profitable demand for slaves, particularly boys and girls, in all of the Moroccan cities, a young negress having a market value of anywhere from $80 to $120.

"Although the bulk of the slaves are driven across the Sahara by the time-honored method, exceptionally pretty girls are often brought from West African ports in French vessels as passengers and disposed of to wealthy Moors by private sale. So great is the demand for young and attractive women that girls are frequently stolen from Moorish villages, the slave dealer laying a trail of sweets, of which the native women are inordinately fond, from the outskirts of the village up to neighboring clumps of trees, behind which he conceals himself, pouncing out upon his unsuspecting victims as they approach. If France succeeds in stamping out the slave trade in Morocco as effectually as she has in her other African possessions she will prove herself indeed the flail of the Lord."

TENDING HIS FLOCK BY NIGHT

Photographs by Underwood & Underwood, N. Y.

By BRUCE BARTON

INTERMINGLED with sounds of New York's Christmas festivity, a hoarse anthem will be heard in Madison Square. It will be the angels' song, peace on earth, good will toward men, but even an angel would hardly recognize it. For the singers will be shaggy, chattering outcasts to whom earth has neither given peace nor men good will; and the sharp blasts of the winter night will catch up the strain and scatter it under the wheels of the cars that rush along Broadway and the buses that hurry up 5th avenue. But the song will be sung, and should you hear it you will know that a shepherd is tending his flock by night. The chaplain is ministering to his own.

"There is something in what that chap says."

You never heard of "the chaplain"? Then you have not known New York by night, for he has been there in that spot, rain or shine, for more than twenty-one years. Stop a minute and draw up into the circle of his arc light. I will show you the strangest service that is held in America; a sermon the purpose of which is to put the audience to sleep, preached in a church whose altar is a fire box, its chancel rail a curbstone and its pulpit a hydrant.

You are not cold already? Look across there at the other worshipers; there isn't an overcoat among them.

He is Chaplain Frederick Rotzler, and the name of his church — that stretch of blank pavement behind the Worth monument in Madison Square —is St. John Baptist Pentecostal Evangelist. But by any other name it would do its work as well. Twenty-one years ago he was preaching in that spot to an audience made up of equal portions of those who expected to sleep in the neighboring hotels and those who were certain to sleep in the park, when a man pushed through the crowd and dropped some money into his hand. He tried to return the money, but the man had vanished. And the chaplain's gaze, following the path which he had taken, came sharp against the figure of a poor wretch buttoning a newspaper inside his ragged jacket—and stopped. The search for the man who had given the money was ended; here was the man who needed. When the sermon was ended the chaplain gathered out of his audience the fifteen or twenty vestless and stockingless ones, marched them across town to a cheap lodging house and, using the money which had been given him, put them to bed.

An Audience Waiting for Beds

By what channels news is spread through the unwashed world even the police have not discovered. On the next Sunday night the chaplain found himself confronted with a ready-made audience of fifty unshaved, homeless men, lined up in a ragged column of fours. That night at the end of his sermon he passed the hat and again the ragged portion of his congregation was provided for by the better fed. And every Sunday night since and every Wednesday night as well he has preached there bareheaded in the heart of the square. On one side, marshaled into a rude column, the bedless horde has waited, their gaze wandering from the face of the preacher to the faces of those other listeners opposite, who from time to time slip forward to drop their contributions in the preacher's hands. It is the only church I know of where the front pew is more popular than any other, for he who stands first in line receives the first bed check, and many a cold night the back row, having stood until midnight, finds the checks exhausted and returns to its dreary all night march.

"Out of the Darkness"

You will have to move in closer if you are to follow the course of the sermon, for he who is to preach two hours in the open air must not speak with too loud a voice. He has sung the first hymn into the faces of his ragged audience and they—trailing two notes behind—have echoed it back to him. On the little cloth-covered box that has been his platform for all the years he kneels to make the opening prayer, while the hats of the tattered worshipers are lifted and held in their hands. He prays to his Father for his flock, that they may know that they "can't depend on money, can't depend on the world, can't depend on nothing but the love of Christ." He prays that the Lord may open the hearts of kindly people so that these uncared for children of his may find a place to "lay their weary heads," and he asks for a blessing upon the service. Among all the many prayers in the world there is none that will seem to you more sincerely uttered, none spoken in a spirit of more simple trust.

A Church That "Ain't Got Any Debt"

"You may step up closer," says the chaplain, addressing the better dressed portion of his audience. "It won't cost you anything, and maybe you'll like to see a church that ain't got any debt." There is no spoken text, but the scarred faces opposite shout a hundred texts to the curious who stop a moment in the outskirts of the crowd. "The wages of sin," they shout, "is death." And "Look not on the wine"; and "Except ye repent." Because the most of those in the well dressed portion of the congregation are young men the sermon is addressed to them, and it wanders up and down through the Scriptures, dwelling on the destructive power of wickedness and offering the healing and sustaining love of God.

It is not such a sermon as any other church on 5th avenue would pay regularly to hear, but those who stop a moment or more to listen are visibly impressed, partly with the sermon, partly with the fifty-fold text. One by one they slip up to drop their offerings in the chaplain's hand. Here is a lover and his lass; she leaves him on the corner for a moment while she steps across to give their pittance. He is a shipping clerk and she works all day long in one of the department stores. They cannot afford the luxury of many charities, but they have this one and every Sunday night for more than two years they have stopped to drop their mite. A white-fronted clubman pauses with his two companions, and as they reach into capacious pockets for their change you hear him tell the history of the chaplain. "It don't make any difference how cold it is," he says, "it may be down to zero, but this fellow's always here. I've been seeing him now for years, and I tell you he does more good than any church in this town." They pass on, and a group of light-hearted young fellows stop their laughing to listen for a moment, contribute their few pennies and go on more quietly. An automobile halts to allow a pretty girl to step down; she offers her contribution, goes back and is whisked away into the night. The chaplain neither asks for the contributions nor acknowledges them; he stands there upright and dignified, a conscious representative of the Almighty. And his sermon goes on to the end unhalted either by the shopgirl or the daughter of the millionaire. There is a benediction delivered while the crowd stands hats in hand and then "God Be with You Till We Meet Again" sung from throats long ago burned out.

"Tull we meet; tull we meet agin," the musty notes come forth—and as your eye runs over the serried faces of the singers you pick out here and there one who will never meet in that company again. That white whiskered old man whose knees tremble in the chill —he has met his last defeat at the bottle; before another Sunday night he will have passed on. And the slim young chap, two rows back in the center, there is a light of resolution in his eye which was not there before the chaplain began speaking. He does not belong here anyway; he will not be here again. The singing ceases and the chaplain distributes his checks, each one entitling the holder to a 15-cent bed. You go home, for it is nearly midnight, but there is no sleep for the chaplain. From lodging house to lodging house he trudges on his weary rounds to be sure his poor "misfortunates" are in bed. And at each bedside he pauses for a word of silent prayer.

It is his work; he is chaplain of the sockless, confessor of the unshaved. Tonight it will be 4 o'clock before he sleeps and tomorrow he will be up and in the prisons or the workhouses or the hospitals, taking the magazines and fruit which he has collected from goodness knows where, speaking words of kindness and doing little deeds of help. They are his people and it does not concern us that he speaks of them as "poor, desponded chaps" or tells us that they travel under "consumed names." The love of God which he carries to them has not one single trace of self-seeking to adulterate it; if prayers in heaven are answered in the order of their sincerity his stand high upon the list.

And you want to know whether it does any good?

One winter night when the wind caught up the snow and flung it into faces so that it cut like a knife, a smooth faced young chap stood in the line clothed only in trousers and a linen duster. His face was molded in good lines, but despair had settled upon it like a mask; he gazed toward the preacher vacantly and when his check was handed him he walked off to bed with a dragging step. The chaplain followed. That night in the ill-smelling loft of a cheap lodging house the chaplain took the hand of that young fellow and fastened it with a new grip upon life. And the boy, who was not bad but merely heartsick and ready to be claimed by the force of either good or evil, whichever should be the first to reach his side, started the next morning with his face toward the sunrise. Last Sunday night he stopped on his way up the avenue to drop his contribution in the chaplain's hand, for success has not hardened his heart nor blunted his memory.

But you wonder whether it does any good?

They were in the middle of the sermon one night when a smartly dressed woman left her carriage and without so much as a word to the chaplain hurried over to the line and peered into the hungered faces of the flock. Down each row she went, scanning every face, until she reached a white haired old ruin near the back. With a cry she fell on her knees, stretching out her white arms toward him. "Father, oh, father!" she moaned. And bending down the misty eyed old man put his arms around her and pressed his hard lips to her cheek.

And you question whether it does any good?

Trying to Help the Grand Army of Sin

Twenty-one years times 104 services is 2,184. At each of those more than 2,000 services 200 well dressed men and women have paused for a moment in their leisurely walk up 5th avenue. Perhaps it was only a moment. But even a moment is sufficient to paint that picture on the memory; even a moment can stir the heart to wonder at a Power which keeps that strong man standing there bareheaded night after night. The other churches on 5th avenue mean little to the throng that passes them—their open doors provoke hardly an instant's introspection. But he must be thoughtless indeed who will not hesitate before this scene. For prayer is here being made in the midst of the highway and hatless in its presence stand the broken ranks of the grand army of sin.

The chaplain knows that the same hopeless ones cringe into line again and again. He knows how much seed is scattered and how little comes to fruit. But through twenty-one years his faith has not slackened nor his courage run low. He knows, too, whom he has believed. It is enough for him that nights are cold and men homeless. He asks them no questions. It is his place to stand firm upon his carpet covered box offering the love of One who, like them, had no place to lay his head.

"The Chaplain" and a Section of His Transient Night Audience in Madison Square

So on Christmas night a tuneless anthem will be sounded in the heart of Madison Square, and the chaplain will minister to his own.

War's Grim Trail in Thrace

Recent visitors to the vicinity of Adrianople and Chorlou in the interests of the British relief committee bring back sad tales of the destruction caused by war in the whole vilayet of Adrianople and especially in the sandjak of Chorlou, says The Orient, the missionary weekly of Constantinople. The Ottoman army swept northwards and then southwards over this area. The Bulgarian army swept southwards and then withdrew northwards over the same. Then the Ottomans went again over it to Adrianople and Kirk Kilise. The result is that devastation and ruin have left their grim mark everywhere. The thousands of refugees that fled thence to the capital and across into Anatolia have in large numbers returned—but to ruined homes. One family was met returning to Vize who had driven their cart back all the way from Deurt Yol in Cilicia, and they found their home only a blackened and charred wreck.

Out of 3,200 houses in the region of Serai and Vize less than 1,000 were left standing. Out of all the schools, mosques and churches only one was found that had not suffered. From the standpoint of the farming population, a worse fact is the loss of cattle and of farming implements.

NEW PICTURES OF

"THE UNCHANGING EAST" has begun to change, and the time may come when not so much stress will be laid upon the Orient's present as an index to its past. It is possible that even now in our study of the Holy Land we assume too much in this respect. Many of the places more or less authenticated as having figured in Bible history are so guarded and "preserved" that an exercise of imagination is required to restore them to their possible ancient appearance. Yet the traveler in Palestine is on sacred ground and amid sacred associations, and in view of the undoubted fact that many customs and conditions have changed but little the accompanying pictures are of interest.

The use of animal skins as receptacles for liquids is of great antiquity and gives point to Jesus' reference to pouring new wine into new bottles. Among the Jews the skins of cows and goats were used, those of the smaller animals entire. The pig was to them an unclean animal, to be not so much as touched. That the present inhabitants of the land have not the same aversion is evidenced by picture No. 6, showing a large number of pigskins exposed for drying, at Hebron. No. 1 shows such a pigskin in use as a churn, the churning being done by rocking. In No. 9 skins are shown used for carrying water. The slight rise in background of this picture is the scene of the crucifixion—Golgotha, "the place of a skull." "Coffee" has a most unbiblical sound, but No. 2 represents a coffee maker within the home of a sheik. Coffee was introduced into Arabia about the fifteenth century and thence found its way to Palestine. Jacob's well (No. 3), where Jesus talked with the Samaritan woman, is one of the few well authenticated places where the feet of the Saviour trod. The well is now partially filled with rubbish and contains water only at certain seasons of the year. Over it a hut has been built and it may be visited in the company of a priest of the Greek Church who is in charge.

If we should imagine Ruth, as she gleaned in the field of Boaz, to have resembled the modern gleaners seen in No. 4 we might lose much of the romance from the beautiful little idyl of the time of the Judges.

The shrine of the nativity is shown in No. 5, the silver star indicating the Saviour's birthplace. A flight of steps leads to this cavern from the Church of the Nativity. This structure, whether erected by Constantine for his mother, the Empress Helena, or, as some maintain, by Justinian, is certainly one of the most ancient church edifices in existence.

The plowing scene (No. 7) illustrates

I. Kings 19:19, which relates how Elijah "found Elisha the son of Shaphat, who was plowing with twelve yoke of oxen before him, and he with the twelfth." The tent "pitched in the wilderness" (No. 8) illustrates the extreme of the simple life.

A well just outside Nazareth, called the "well of the virgin," is pictured in No. 10. This fountain is believed to have been a source of supply from the earliest times, and it is not impossible that the family of the Saviour shared its gifts with others.

The Christmas in a Snowbank

BY DELLA DIMMITT

FOR THE PAST HOUR there had been a perceptible slackening in speed as the Northern limited plowed gamely ahead in the teeth of the fiercest snowstorm of the year. Now, with a final shock of impotent steam, the engine stood stock still. The train was stalled.

The girl in the rear coach shivered and threw a compassionate glance at the little boy in the blue knickerbockers who had been telling her at intervals all day about the wonderful Christmas he was expecting to have.

It would be a hard blow on him. She wished the sympathetic conductor would break the news to the little fellow, but the conductor was quite obviously leaving that to the girl—school teacher he took her to be—thrust, like the boy, alone upon the uncertain mercies of this great wide, wild Montana.

But for the time the girl was spared the task by the sudden moving forward into the seat behind the boy of the big ranchman who sat well back in the coach and indeed was now the only other occupant save for the presence of a pale man who sat shivering in a furred coat and at intervals coughed in a way that threatened to tear out his lungs. This last passenger had boarded the train at some time during the night. He was in the seat when the girl awoke from an uneasy doze and there he had remained throughout the day, exchanging no words with his fellow travelers, his sunken, somber eyes fixed on space.

But the girl had noticed one curious fact—whenever the pale-faced man shifted his position the eyes of the ranchman were on him—whenever the pale-faced man moved toward the forward car the ranchman stalked grimly after him, though never at any time speaking a word.

The girl had thought little of the circumstance until the gradual emptying of the car and now the crippling of the engine brought her face to face with the alarmed consciousness that here she was—imprisoned for many hours to come—alone, save for the presence of a child, with these two sinister passengers.

But the ranchman was already opening up conversation with the boy.

"I've been hearin' you talk about Christmas, kid. Now, what kind of a Christmas air you expectin' to have?"

The boy stood up with his feet on the chair cushion, and turning his little glowing face on the bearded one back that, with all its rough-hewn strength, wore now a certain kindliness, said, "Well, I don't just know, mister. My Uncle Steve, I expect he'll meet me and take me out where he lives, for I'm to be his boy, now. I never saw my uncle, but my mother she used to tell me lots about him and I guess he's just about right, my Uncle Steve is. I don't know how many boys he's got—I don't know if he's got any. You see, I don't know much of anything yet. That's why I'm so awful anxious to get there." He laughed a delightfully childish, bubbling laugh. "And I don't know what Christmas will be at my Uncle Steve's, either, but"—looking very intently into the ranchman's face—"don't you 'spect there'll be turkey?"

"Sure!" the ranchman's verdict was quick and positive—"if yer Uncle Steve's got a gun and kin shoot."

"I knew it," cried the boy, excitedly stamping on the cushion, "I knew it."

"There'll be turkey and cranberry sauce?"

With hopeful eagerness he put the question.

"If they can get the cranberries—yes."

The ranchman's voice was not quite satisfying, but it carried hope.

"An' mince pie?"

"Well, I don't know about that, kid. Mince pie don't generally grow in these parts, still, if there's any women folks at yer Uncle Steve's I reckon they could manage the pies—I reckon they could. You'll have eatin's of some sort and if you're hungry enough it will all taste good. Air ye expectin' anything beside eatin's?"

"Presents!" The boy almost exploded in uttering that. "I know enough about Christmas for that. Why, 'fore my mother died, I got 'em regular, but at the institootion"—he pronounced the word with difficulty—"Christmas ain't any diff'runt from other days. They give you a orange an' a pair o' mittens. Joe—that's the boy I slep' with at the institootion—says all Christmases is alike, but Joe he never had no mother an' he ain't got no Uncle Steve, so how could he know? I like Joe, I tell you, mister, but I did hate to come off and leave Joe fur the sup'visor to kick an' maul. Joe he cried most all night 'fore I came away. He's littler 'n me—I don't cry, mister. I told Joe I'd get my Uncle Steve to send for him, too. Joe—he won't have no Christmas this year, but next year——"

The ranchman was listening with absorbed attention. "But them presents," he cut in; "you ain't told me about them."

"No," shouted the boy, his little face that had grown wistful once again lit with abounding joy, "and how can I tell you that when I don't know myself? Course, it may be only mittens an' a orange an' then it might be—why, it might be a—pony!" Here his voice dropped to a low, mysterious whisper. "A pony an' a silver bridle like the prince had on his milk white steed when he rode off to wake Beauty. What would you think of that?"

"Well," speculated the ranchman, "I don't know as that's altogether onpossible, seein' as horseflesh is so plentiful and so durn cheap out this-a-way."

"Oh, no," broke in the boy, speaking now quite in his everyday tone, "it couldn't ever be a pony—I was only makin' believe—you can make believe anything, mister."

"What might yer Uncle Steve's last name be?" asked the ranchman in random curiosity.

"Rawson." The boy said it proudly as if it were the greatest conjuring power in the universe. "He lives at Chanute Pass, my Uncle Steve does."

"Rawson! Chanute Pass!"

The ranchman drew back as if he had been shot and bit an escaping oath in two.

He sat staring straight ahead of him, saying nothing, while the boy rambled on about the Christmas so obviously drawn from his own imagination, but when the boy out of pure joy made one of his frequent skips into the far end of the car, the ranchman leaned across and touched the arm of the girl, who hastily withdrew her brown, troubled eyes from the far reaching snow wastes without.

"I hope you won't take no offense, miss, but I'd like to ask if this boy here is any connection o' yourn."

"No," she said. "Oh, no; but he's such a dear, friendly little soul that it was impossible not to get interested in him and his Christmas. I do hope that uncle of his is all that Davie thinks he is."

"Well, I kin tell you he ain't." There was fierce energy in the big, suppressed voice. "My ranch ain't fur from Chanute Pass and I know that Steve Rawson. He ain't there no more; he went betwixt days, leavin' no address behind—he got notice served."

"You mean——" The girl's bewildered eyes went wide, but she got no further. The boy had skipped back. The ranchman rose in haste, not on that account; but the man in the furred overcoat was making for the forward car, brushing past the conductor whose reappearance brought the question the boy had asked so many times before that day—"Will we get there—sure—in time for Christmas?"

"Conductor"—the eyes of the girl were now full of a vague alarm—"why does that one man always follow the other so?"

The conductor gave the upturned girlish face one quick, searching glance. He saw beauty and innocence as it had come straight from the hand of God; he saw, moreover, strength and courage of no common order, so he said very quietly, "Well, it looks like someone had come upon his enemy unawares—and had the drop on him. But you"—he added with reassuring gentleness—"need have no fear—none whatever. The big one, whatever else may be true of him, is first of all—a man. There'll be no—no unpleasantness of any sort while a woman and child remain aboard. When you both are well out of the way—then—look out!"

"Can't something be done?" the girl cried in sharp appeal, but the boy was plucking at the conductor's sleeve, insistently putting his question.

"My little man"—the conductor's hand strayed to Davie's bright, waving hair—"there are three little fellows waiting in my home to-night listening for the whistle of my engine as she pulls into the yards. There's a tree and some fixings back there in my bunk, but I'm desperately afraid those little chaps of mine will have to get through Christmas somehow without any tree or any presents or any father. It looks now as if this old stalled engine wouldn't be able to pull us through on time. I'm mighty sorry."

"I'm sorry, too, conductor." Davie was winking the tears back bravely. He was too big, too game to cry. "I'm sorry"—his voice broke in spite of him—"for those poor little boys of yours."

"Oh, conductor," the girl rose unsteadily to her feet, "I can't stand this. Lend me your tree. Davie shall have a Christmas."

The girl's thoughts were seemingly all for Davie as she set about the preparations for this weirdest of all Christmas celebrations with its strangely assorted human elements.

She conferred aside with the ranchman. To the man in the furred overcoat she went with such whole-hearted faith in the underlying goodness of men that he awoke out of his abstraction and drew forth the contents of all his pockets for her choose a gift for the boy. His knife? Well, she would take that. She laughed softly, picturing the boy's delight in this dear possession. The money? Well, not—not just yet. There would be time enough later to discuss his need for that.

They must all set their brains to work in the effort to decide what disposition was to be made of Davie now that his uncle had proved a miscreant. It would certainly break his heart to go back to the asylum from which he had been sent out, but it seemed the only possible thing to do. She wished some home might be found for the poor child. The conductor's? Well, yes, she had thought of that herself, but his wife, it seemed, was very frail and overburdened with the cares of her own family. Oh, she wished she could take Davie with her. She had a mother far east—just the two of them now. She hoped some day to send back for her mother, but—well, things had gone against them of late and the outlook was uncertain. And as the innocent plottings deepened the girl—Ruth Jessamy she had told Davie her name was, such a pretty one, too—gave out far more of these little intimate self-revelations than she was aware.

The night drew on, and in the far end of the brilliantly illuminated forward car the tree hung with its improvised gifts and, gemmed with candles ready for the lighting, waited on the story—the story of the world's first Christmas.

Very softly Ruth Jessamy was telling it to Davie—just to Davie. But the three men sitting silent and apart caught every word as the girlish voice rose pure and distinct in the quiet of the car.

To Davie, his lips apart, his blue eyes wide and full of kindling lights, the story was exceedingly real—he could almost see the Babe lying there in the manger, see the wondrous light in the sky and hear the song, so close at hand those angels were.

Did he know what the song meant!

Why, it meant—and the girl's voice grew divinely tender—the coming of love into the world, the reign of love over the world—the love that was like the love of brothers—like the love he had for little Joe. Such love as that drew men on to help one another, to stand by one another, to forgive one another—to forgive all men everywhere, even enemies.

At the word "enemies" Davie stiffened. "I know what an en'my is," he cried out in his startling clear voice. "I've got an en'my—it's that old sup'visor. He kicks the boys an' they dassent tell on him. When I get big"—his voice shrilled through the empty space back—"I'm going back an'—an'—some night—I'm going to kill that sup'visor!"

In the shocked silence following this passionate outburst so strange on the part of a child, the quick intake of the girl's breath could be distinctly heard.

"Oh, Davie"—there was such grief in her voice—"then this beautiful Christmas is not for you."

"Why," he cried in alarm, "you said it was for me. You said God sent me this Christmas—you said——" Tears choked him. He wasn't man enough to bear that.

"But, Davie, with hate and murder in your heart——"

"But he did this to me," sobbed the child as, rolling back his little sleeve, he disclosed what looked to be the blackened imprints of cruel fingers gripping the tender flesh, the sight of which brought the ranchman's great fist involuntarily clenched to his knee.

But the girl only touched it pitifully with her soft lips and once again took up the story thread. It was not as the Christ Child she spoke of him now, but as the world's Redeemer dying the death of the cross that he might show men how great a thing it was to love—even enemies.

It was so simply, so sweetly, so movingly told that Davie's heart melted within him and of his own accord he declared his willingness to forgive the supervisor.

"Then," said the girl—and the light in her eyes was something wonderful—"you are quite fit, Davie, quite fit, to see the Christmas."

"Shall we all go in?" She said it with a delicate stress on the "all" as she looked about.

"I believe I'm ready," the conductor spoke as one who weighs a matter.

"I'd like to go in——" the furred passenger said doubtfully.

Only the ranchman moved and that for the singular purpose of laying something—a murderous looking something it was, too—in the girl's lap.

"The load's out," he said briefly. "I reckon you kin light them candles most any time now."

And they all went in.

The brave glitter of the candles was dying out and the ranchman through half-shut eyes was watching the wearied but still exultant Davie transferring his treasures one by one into Ruth Jessamy's lap.

"You help keep 'em. I've got so many," he laughed rapturously, "I'm afraid I'll lose some of 'em."

"I've been thinkin', kid," the ranchman was speaking with careful deliberation, "that if anything should happen so's that uncle o' yourn didn't show up at Chanute Pass I'd like mighty well to have a boy about your size; fact is, I'd like to have two boys. If that Joe could find it convenient to travel this far, why, I know where I kin lay my hands on a couple o' ponies—Shetlands, mostly mane and tail, standin' just so high—that I believe would just about suit ye. Them silver bridles, though," he went on dreamily, apparently taking no notice that the boy had drawn nearer and nearer and was now leaning forward, fascinated, against his knee, "never having seen any such, I ain't so shore about them, but if there's silver bridles anywhere to be met with in the state o' Montana, or out of it, I reckon I can fetch 'em up fur ye—I reckon I can."

The boy had by this time climbed onto the ranchman's knee, but taking no notice of that either, he continued: "The thing that's botherin' me is what to do with ye right now. You'd ought to go to school and be learned things—saying yer pray'rs and washin' back o' yer ears and such as that I'd never in the world know how to teach ye. Now if I only knowed some—some——"

"Some gentle, Christian lady," helpfully volunteered the conductor, "who would keep these boys for you—train them—bring them up rightly——"

"Why, she could name her figger," concluded the ranchman, breathing easier. "I reckon old Bill Leiscester'd be good for it."

"Leicester!" echoed the conductor—"Leicester!" He threw back his head and laughed, a touch of excitement in his manner. "Well, yes, I reckon he would be good for most any amount under the ten-million mark. So you're William J.? And you"—the conductor shot a keen glance at the other man—"were once Montana's——"

"Never mind that now." The other lifted a pale and deprecating finger. "Say, rather, that I was once William J. Leicester's partner and—friend."

"Bill"—there was an imploring quality in the weak grave voice—"I can tell you something that if you will only listen to will prove to you that I never——" A fit of coughing seized and shook him so that the girl cried out and the men rose in alarm, but by a supreme effort he recovered himself; he even smiled weakly at the ranchman saying brokenly, "We'll send you to Bermuda, Bob—Bermuda will make a new man of you."

"Never mind me," he whispered back in the full consciousness that yet another enemy had been this night forgiven, "it's—it's the boy's Christmas."

But the boy had succumbed to weariness and now lay fast asleep, his bright head sunk in the hollow of the ranchman's powerful arm.

"It strikes me," said the ranchman gravely, a strangely sweet thrill to which he had long been a stranger coursing through his great frame at the impact of the slight, warm body, "that some o' the rest of us air havin' a Christmas, too."

The girl's tired little head dropped, but yes, she was having a Christmas—just how great a one she had not yet realized, but the angels were keeping watch o'erhead.

"What's the matter, Willie?" asked the mother as the lad entered the house weeping. "The boy across the way hit me," he replied. "Oh, well, I wouldn't cry for that," she returned. "Show that you can be a little man." "I ain't crying for that," he retorted. "Then what are you crying for?" "He ran into the house before I could get at him."—Birmingham Age-Herald.

Our Christmas Gifts to Him

BY LEE McCRAE

HAVE YOU EVER TOLD the Christmas story without a new meaning flashing from some old phrase, like the sudden gleam of a star from a sky full of stars? Each year the Christmastide has its own special revelation for me. This year it has put fresh significance into the wise men's gifts.

From afar they came, bearing three things—gold, frankincense and myrrh. Do you realize that these three gifts brought by loving hearts, as all our gifts should be, typify everything that the king of Bethlehem wants from humankind?

Gold stands for service—pure service. It means labor, and is the reward of labor. By bringing it to the Christ-Child we give that which costs us toil of body and brain, the best part of ourselves. Is not this "a best gift"? And is not service always and everywhere acceptable to the Master?

Frankincense, to the ancient world and to large parts of the world even on this anniversary of his coming, was and is the breath of prayer and praise, sent heavenward. What tribute so sweet to the heart of the world's Lover as the pleadings and gratitude of his own? Surely then we can have no better present for him this Christmas time than frankincense.

But myrrh! Why, myrrh is the bitterest of spices! It typifies anguish and grief and woe! Bring myrrh? Yes, though it does in all truth mean bitterness. The wise men brought it and it was accepted. It must be, then, that our sorrows, our trials, our bitterness are to be taken to Him. The beautiful things are not alone to be his gift. It is because we would rid ourselves of them that we are to lay our sorrows at the feet of Christ. We leave them there because they are really gifts, and the bringing is an honor to him. He wants the myrrh of our lives, just as a true parent would lift the burden from the shoulders of a tired, crying child, and bear it himself for love's sake.

Oh, that the grief-stricken among us could get this part of the Christmas message, and bring and leave—would you take back a gift?—all their woes with the King!

Service, prayer, praise and bitternesses! Gold, frankincense and myrrh! And these gifts earth's poorest may bring in greatest abundance. The wise men have led the way.

Verses Old and New

THE SECOND COMING

How will Christ come back again,
How will he be seen, and when?
Where his chosen way?
Will he come at dead of night,
Shining in his robes of light,
Or at dawn of day?

When will this sad world rejoice,
Listening to that golden voice,
Speaking unto men?
Lives there one who yet will cry
Loud to startled passers-by,
"Christ has come again"?

List the answer: Christ is here!
Seek, and you shall find him near,
Dwelling on the earth.
By the world's awakened thought,
This great miracle is wrought,
This the second birth.

While you wonder where and how
Christ shall come—behold him now,
Patient, loving, meek,
Looking from your neighbor's eyes,
Or in humble toilers' guise—
Lo! the Christ you seek.

Search for him in human hearts;
In the shops, and in the marts;
And beside your hearth;
Search and speak the watchword "Love."
And the Christ shall rise, and prove
He has come to earth.

Sorrowful ofttimes is he
That we have not eyes to see—
Have not ears to hear;
As we call to him afar,
Out beyond some distant star,
While he stands so near.

"Seek him, seek him, where he dwells,"
Chime the voices of the bells
On the Christmas air,
"Christ has come to earth again;
He is in the hearts of men;
Seek and find him there.

—Ella Wheeler Wilcox, in The Delineator.

Asks Suggestions for Graces

Dear Editor Home Council—Will you please publish a number of short "graces" to be said at the table, and oblige AN OLD SUBSCRIBER.

[The desire which "Subscriber" has voiced, for some new "graces"—new, because he has no doubt asked God's blessing on the family food for many years—is by no means an unusual one. More than one person has felt the monotony of the same grace.]

Brief but Comprehensive

Willie is learning to save time by dealing with things in the mass instead of in detail.

"Well," said he to his mother shortly before Christmas, "I've written a letter to Santa Claus, and I think it covers everything I want."

"That's good," said his mother. "What did you ask for?"

"Two toy shops and a candy store," said Willie.

One Way of "Putting It Up" to Your Boy

A NUMBER of writers have pointed out that the difference in the birth rate of the well-to-do classes and that of the more rapidly multiplying laboring classes is fraught with serious consequences. Society is thus represented as selecting for extinction its most capable breeds and becoming in consequence an aggregate of increasingly mediocre individuals. Erville B. Woods, however, in an article in The American Journal of Sociology declares that a subtler danger to society lies in the waste of unguided personal ability.

"The man," says Professor Woods, "who is fortunate enough to hit it in selecting or being put into a vocation succeeds if he has good abilities. Another man of equal or greater abilities, just as industrious, self-controlled or sagacious, who does not hit it, plods along, tasting most of the pleasures of life in the pursuit of activities outside of his trade or business."

This condition of things is partly the result of an inadequate educational system. Of those boys who persist to the end of the grammar school course or even through the high school not many are in possession of the specific knowledge, skill, discernment or qualification adequate to the selection or the accomplishment of tasks to which they must presently address themselves. "We teach our youth about the characteristics of geographical regions, the properties of numbers and the peculiarities of language. As they go on with their studies we teach them the characteristics of chemical elements and compounds, the physical properties of bodies, the texture and mechanism of organic structures, both vegetable and animal, and their young minds unfold in the presence of a world richer and more complicated than they had ever discerned. But about the qualities of men demanded by the world's work, about the role played by tact, by ability to meet men, by differing traits and tendencies of mind, as related to individual success in specific present-day tasks, we teach little.

"That the demands of one profession or craft are radically different from those of another, that the application of individual endowment to its appropriate task is a tremendously difficult thing, they learn only in the wasteful school of experience. . . . Boys find themselves in their vocations as a result of custom, heredity, propinquity or accident far oftener than through deliberate and conscious choice, made with knowledge of conditions.

"Several hundred letters sent out to people engaged in various occupations, asking them, among other questions, 'Why did you choose your present occupation?' brought such answers as, 'Because that was what the other boys were doing,' 'Because I happened to get a job at that trade,' 'Because that was the principal line of work near my home.'"

An effective remedy for such haphazard plunges into the serious business of life lies, in Mr. Woods's belief, in the provision of scientific vocational advice for young people as a part of their formal preparation. To possess capacities which, for lack of proper direction, are utterly wasted is nothing less than tragic. Many a man who is today filling with indifferent success a mediocre position would have been capable of splendid achievement had his natural tendencies been turned into their proper channel.

"In their preference for occupations boys are guided by whim, contagious admiration and ambition divorced from sound reason oftener than by a preconceived compatibility between personal traits and the requirements of tasks. In the actual selection of occupations not even whimsical preferences are allowed to guide in very many cases, but rather the first remunerative opening in the local industrial mechanism determines the career of the boy quite irrespective of taste or aptitude. There results a great waste of abilities which remain in some cases undiscovered and in others misapplied.

"While equality of opportunity cannot be provided by any mere change in educational methods, yet as a step in the direction of diffusing the opportunity of intelligent vocational outlook, every boy before leaving the elementary school should be given an accurate idea of the nature of the principal kinds of human work, the qualities demanded by them, the preparation required, the rewards offered, the advantages and opportunities for usefulness which they afford. He should, moreover, be taught the rudiments of self-appraisement from the vocational point of view and should have the benefit of counsel with a professional vocational counselor who is thoroughly informed with regard to the industrial opportunities of the community and the means of entrance thereupon."

So much for the school's responsibility in the matter of properly directing the ability of the country's youth into paths of efficiency. But back of the school must stand the parent who, because of ampler knowledge of the boy's temperament and tendencies, inherited and otherwise, has a more fundamental understanding of his capabilities and who has the sacred first hand privilege of wisely developing them. "It is not," as Professor Woods says, "only a question of what individuals are able to do, but also of what they are put up to do." And the chief put-uper of a boy ought to be his father. This putting up cannot all be left to the school. When parents and school cooperate to "link the real interests and energies of the boy spirit with productive tasks, new energy thus legimately released will increase the material conditions of happiness and make men better neighbors and members of society."

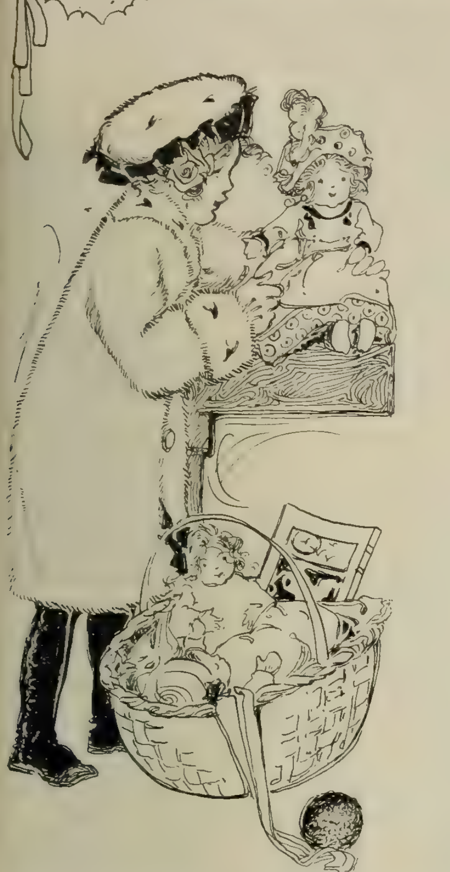
Santa Claus Come True

By Pauline Frances Camp



'Twas a dingy back room; one window, a door;
Not a sign of a carpet or rug on the floor;
A rickety table, a cupboard near bare,
And little lame Maggie propped up in a chair.

'Twas the day before Christmas, but Maggie, alack!
Expected no presents from Santa Claus's sack.
"Sure, Santa has too many fine street to go,
To visit the children in Tenement row."

But she shut her eyes tight, lest the teardrops should fall;
For she longed for a dolly, no matter how small.
Now if she went napping I really can't say,
But, sleeping or waking, it happened this way:

The door opened softly, with scarcely a stir;
In came a small figure, all muffled in fur.
It carried a basket, most carefully packed,
And soon on the table its contents were stacked.

There were three lovely dolls, each a different size,
And one was a baby that opened its eyes.
There were other things, too, that I can't stop to name;
Then the little form vanished the way that it came.

"Honk, honk!" something tooted, then, fainter, once more,
And wee Maggie started, and stared at the door.
Such a wonderful dream, so she wistfully thought,
Of gifts that a kindly somebody had brought!

But it wasn't a dream, for, oh, there lay the dolls,
With their ribbons and laces and gay folderols!
Apples, candy and popcorn and oranges, too,
And a beautiful picture book, crimson and blue!

* * * * *

Now Gladys Evangeline Dorothy May,
Who lives on the avenue some miles away,
When counting her dollies the very next morn,
Found three of the dear little creatures had gone.

But she wasn't surprised—not a bit, so they say;
Only nodded her head in a very wise way.
And her lips curled right up in a curve that they had When Gladys Evangeline felt very glad!

Why Hughie Missed His Train

By Sarah Cory Rippey

"HUGHIE!" No answer. "Hugh-ie!" The little boy in the woodshed started guiltily and shoved something into his trousers pocket. "Hugh-ie-e-e!"

"Yessum, I'm coming," and Hughie Morrison slammed down the cover of his tool chest and ran into the house.

"Where were you, Hughie—what kept you so long?" Mrs. Morrison, who was tying up Little Sister's hair with a gay new Christmas ribbon, gave the bow a final pat as she spoke. "I want you to run over to Auntie Brewster's with this basket. Tell auntie 'Merry Christmas' for me. I am sorry I can't get over to see her myself, but I must get dressed this minute or we shall miss the train. Don't you get left, sonny. But of course you won't," she added with a laugh; "not with that new watch to help you keep track of the time. Hurry along, dear—and if you spill that precious pie I'll see that Little Sister gets both the drumsticks at dinner. Come to the depot from auntie's. We'll meet you there."

Hughie picked up the basket carefully and started off. Auntie Brewster was sweeping the snow from her front steps as he stamped up the walk. "Well, well, well!" she cried heartily. "If here isn't Santa Claus's partner, for all the world! I guess from the looks of that basket the old fellow didn't leave anything in his precious pack for anybody else. Come right in. He didn't bring you anything, I suppose?"

"Oh, not much," said Hughie modestly, "only a gramophone and a watch—grandpa gave it to me for learning to tell time—and——"

"Not a real watch!" Auntie Brewster threw up her hands in amazement. "Show it to me this minute!"

Hughie started in some embarrassment to pull off his mittens. "Why, it's—you see—my overcoat——"

"To be sure! Never mind unbuttoning it. Going to grandpa's to spend the day as usual, I suppose?"

"Yes," said Hughie, with a look of relief, "nine forty-five. I must be going."

"Not one step will you go till you've had some of Auntie Brewster's 'lasses cookies!" cried the old lady, bustling off to the kitchen.

Hughie looked helplessly around for a clock, but there wasn't one in sight. "I'm afraid I can't wait," he hesitated as Mrs. Brewster returned.

"Nonsense! You've oceans of time. Eat away!" she urged.

Hughie took a cookie and uneasily nibbled at the scallops. Boys with watches are not supposed to have to ask other people the time, and Hughie squirmed in his chair as he felt the minutes slipping by. But Auntie Brewster insisted on his eating three cookies before she let him go, with a kiss on each red cheek and "love to the folks."

Once out of the gate, Hughie started on the run for the depot, but when he was only halfway there a shrill whistle told him the train was coming, and though he put on his best speed, the last car was rumbling out of the station when he reached it, breathless and panting. Father and mother and Little Sister were on their way to grandpa's, but Hughie was left behind.

"There's another train in two hours," said the station agent consolingly. "Your mother said to tell you to come on that. Here's your ticket. You're to stay at Mis' Brewster's till train time."

Auntie Brewster, however, might say things about boys with watches missing trains. Hughie preferred to go back home. He had had his own latchkey ever since he had been big enough to know how to use one, and he let himself into the empty house with a shiver of lonesomeness. The big clock in the hall chimed 10. The others were about at Evanston now, Hughie thought. In another hour they would be at Benton. Grandpa would meet them at the station with the big sleigh, and they would all jingle gayly up to the house. Then grandma would rush out in her white apron. "Where's Hughie?" he could hear her cry. And then mother would reply, "Missed the train." Hughie's head went down on his arms. "Missed the train!" grandma would exclaim; "how could he with that watch——"

Hughie's thought stopped at the watch. For the first time in his life he almost wished he didn't have to go to grandpa's. He threw his overcoat on a chair, drew his sleeve across his eyes and started "Marching Through Georgia" on the new gramophone for company. Then he played all the other tunes that came with it.

When the big clock boomed out 11 Hughie put the records away and started upstairs to wash his face, the house growing bigger and emptier and lonesomer at every step. The smell of smoke was strong in the hall. It made Hughie cough as he went along toward the bathroom, and as he opened the door to go in he fell back gasping and bewildered as a thick cloud of smoke burst through the doorway. The bathroom was on fire.

Hughie stood coughing and frightened. What should he do? Suddenly his father's instructions flashed into his mind: "If the house ever takes fire, Hughie, run straight to the phone and call up 'Central O.'" He rushed headlong down the stairs. "Central O. Yes! Oh, please send an engine quick to 1208 West street! We've got a fire!"

In no time the fire engine was at the door, and the firemen swarming upstairs. Then the neighbors began to rush in, and for ten minutes there was so much confusion and tramping up and down and shouting that Hughie wasn't sure just what was happening. But soon the fire chief came up and slapped him on the back.

"All out, son," he cried heartily. "Not much harm done. Matches slipped down the register, I guess, and the mice gnawed them and started the fire. But what I want to know is,

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

December 21, 1913—The Word Made Flesh

Everyday View of the Lesson

By J. L. Scott

Lesson Text, John 1:1-18. Golden Text, John 1:14: The Word became flesh and dwelt among us.

Joshua and John have but little in common. They are as far apart as were the times in which they lived. Last week Joshua was occupying the center of the stage. We heard the ring of his battleax and saw his enemies fall by the thousands. But now we have a complete contrast. Joshua gives place to John and the victories of peace are substituted for those of war.

The age of Joshua is vastly inferior to the one that lies just before. In reading history one must remember that to record a thing is not necessarily to sanction it. And thus in Old Testament history many things are recorded simply because they are true and not because they had the approval of God or man. Men seldom rise very far above their surroundings. There are stains upon the lives of the patriarchs, but we must remember that the ideals they faced were far distant from the age in which they lived. They walked toward the East and met the morning on the way.

John Endeavors to Controvert Erroneous Theories of His Times

This gospel of John has no preface. It is a palace without a portico. Matthew writes of Jesus on his human side. He shakes the family tree and names fall like apples in October. But eternity admits of no dates. John sweeps away every barrier and declares that before all time "was the Lord." Errors had been creeping into the church and to controvert these was undoubtedly his purpose. In those days there was a school of philosophers who taught that the supreme God could not come in contact with man, hence the world was created not by him but by a creative energy which they called the Word. Others argued that inasmuch as God must be separate from matter the incarnation was only such in appearance. Both of these errors John evidently had in mind. Special stress is laid upon the fact that the Word was not a mere energy but God himself; further, he was made flesh and dwelt among us.

A word is the outward form of an inward thought, the subjective become objective. That idea runs through the entire chapter. No man has seen God at any time, the Word alone has declared him. This Word is not an attribute but a Person. This Person was, in the beginning, with God; yes, he was God. Creation is ascribed to him. All things were made by him. In him was life. He was the source and author of existence. And that higher life that imparts light and peace comes from him also. All this assumes the preexistence of Christ. Jesus was not born—he came. Christmas was only the door through which he passed from one world to another.

Significance of Christ Seen by Comparison with John

Truth is best seen by comparison. John the Baptist was justly esteemed as the greatest of all the prophets. At one time some had even regarded him as the Messiah himself. But the contrast between him and the Christ was infinite. John the Baptist was a man, and only that. He made no worlds and in the beginning he was not with God. He came as a witness to a Light not his own. His mission was greater than himself. John imparted no power. He was a voice crying in the desert: "Prepare ye the way of the Lord." The Lord came and the world refused to receive him, but as many as received him to them gave he power such as God alone could grant. John brought a message and there his mission ended, but Jesus brought the power of a sonship that bound the believer to his God.

This passes into an experience. "Of his fullness we all received, and grace for grace." The best evidence of Christ's deity is seen in a regenerated heart. Moses gave the law. It was written on tablets of stone and became the constitution of Israel. It was a revelation from God, but it only partially expressed his nature. God could not write himself fully in words. It was reserved for Christ to live what he was. Grace and truth came through him. Primarily the word "grace" means that which imparts joy and truth, implies completeness. Grace and truth, then, signify a deeper knowledge of God—the gospel as compared with the law.

Christmas swings on double hinges—outward toward man and inward toward God. The character of God in a fuller revelation was essential to the salvation of man. Men become like to the gods they serve. The Mosaic law had fulfilled its purpose. God had promised something better, and Christmas marked the fulfillment of that promise. The fullness of time had come. There was a commotion among the stars as the angels swept their way toward the earth. Their song was above human conception. Song is the spirit of the age set to music, but no such sentiment as that voiced by the angels ruled the earth. Their song was a prophecy not yet fulfilled.

Everything about the birth of Jesus savors of the supernatural. The wise men following their mysterious light and the virgin mother in silent bewilderment, wondering at what manner of child this could be, were fitting parts of that strange event. There are certain tests by which we judge the truthfulness of every narrative. That the shepherds heard songs at night could have been easily written, but to compose that song was a very different matter. The song of the angels and the blessing of Simeon are literature stamped with truth.

Deity of Christ Gives Authority to His Words and Deeds

We live what we are, and Jesus' life was more than that of man. Christ's deity is to us the final seal upon all that he said and did. When he speaks of immortality we listen because he knew. His words have the authority of God. John's testimony is direct. He knew him the best of all the twelve, and he believed him to be divine. This chapter affords abundant proof. The mystery of the incarnation no one can solve, but if we look the other way we face a still wider sea. He is the Word, without whom Christmas becomes but a name and faith an idle dream.

The Lesson Verse by Verse

By Hermon D. Jenkins

ANALYSIS—The center of history is the advent. This because Jesus Christ is the Word and the Power of God. Being such, he needed, to introduce his work, a forerunner who would utter a preparatory message. The result of Christ's coming deepens guilt or saves from it.

It was, as Dr. Schaff says, "the great thought of a little pope," Dionysius Exiguus, to introduce to the Christian world that method of computation by which Christian nations were to date everything from the birth of their Saviour, seeing in his advent that central point of history about which all human events logically revolve. Except for some "far off divine event toward which the whole creation moves," there is no history, only annals. It is not possible to affirm the progress of the race unless the race has a goal. The advent of Jesus into human affairs caused the universe to change front. We may well at this season of the year when his birth is celebrated interrupt any series of lessons to study together from some common point of view the coming of One whose birth was the birth of modern literature, law and religion.

Existence of Israel and Birth of Christ for One Purpose

The Sunday school world has been for the past year following the early history of God's chosen people. We have noted the answer of Abraham to the great call. We have analyzed his character, have followed the fortunes of his descendants, have seen how they were strangely exiled to Egypt and then, long afterwards, returned amid a succession of wonders, to their promised home in Palestine. What was all this for? Israel existed that Christ might be born and Christ was born that men might be saved from the wreck and ruin of sin.

Verse 1—"Jesus Christ was the Word of God. The term 'Word' in this personal sense is peculiar to John. It occurs only in the first words of this gospel and in Revelation 19:13, 'His name is called the Word of God.'"

When a sovereign dispatches a representative to some foreign court he puts down in writing what he would have his ambassador say. But with Jesus there was no need of such precaution; for what God would say Jesus said. We have all seen twins who looked so much alike no one but their parents could tell them apart. But they never were so twined in soul that they said the same things, had the same views of life and duty and lived for the same purposes, animated by the same hopes. But Jesus was the Word of God because his life was the life of God mirrored soul for soul.

Verse 2—Eternal existence and (v. 3) creation are attributes of Deity. They both belong to Christ. He alone could say, "Before Abraham was born I am" (John 8:58). He alone commanded the seas and the wind as One who made them (Mark 4:39). He could do what he would with the wine (John 2:7-11), with the bread (John 6:5-14), and with the fig tree (Mark 11:14, 20).

Verse 4—His very life shed a glory round it that showed men how to walk and where. Many men give light by their advice, but not by their deeds. Jesus was the living Word. His life and his lips delivered one message.

John, the Forerunner of Jesus, Sent from God with Message

Verse 6—John was a prophet with a message. He did not assume the duty—he was charged with it. He was sent. He did not obey earthly kings (Matt. 14:3-12), because God sent him. What he taught he had not gathered from the traditions of the rabbis.

Verse 7—It is true of any age that it cannot receive every truth to its own profit. The first Americans to accept and practice vaccination were mobbed in their own homes, and when Harvey announced the circulation of the blood he was ostracized by most of his own profession. Had it not been for William Wilberforce the world might have executed instead of eulogizing Abraham Lincoln, the emancipator. John's preaching of a vital religion instead of a ritualistic one prepared people for that preaching of Jesus which went deeper and rose higher (Matt. 3:11-12).

Verse 8—We often say of a doctrine, "My friend So-and-So believes it, and he is a man of fine spiritual insight. I am prepared to believe anything or any person he indorses." Our Lord's mission must be short. He realized that somebody was neeeded to break up the fallow ground and get people to understand that to be shut out of the synagogue was not to be lost. John had a glorious task to fill and nobly did he discharge it.

The Worldly Are Not Likely to See Christ as He Is

Verse 10—The worldly world "knew him not." There is such a thing as being in the world but not of it (John 17:15-16). But when a man permits himself to be saturated with ambitions, passions and appetites which belong to this world and this world only he is not likely to see in Christ the "one altogether lovely." Some years ago a critic of the pulpit said to the writer, "When men preach the gospel in all its natural attractiveness men will crowd the church." To which I could only answer, "When Jesus preached it men hurried to crucify him."

Verse 11—The peculiarly mournful, the tragic fact was that Jesus came to the class who of all living persons were most favored. They were in a significant sense "his own." He did not preach in Rome to the rude and cruel soldiers of the empire, but he came to the city of his ancestors, to the homes of his own kin, to those familiar from childhood with the oracles of God (Rom. 3:1-2).

Verses 12-13—But there were some who received him and who thus received power to become the sons of God. There is a sense in which all men are the children of God, and in that sense the phrase is often used in the Bible. But there is another sense in which only those who are "born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God," are his children; just as some of the descendants of Abraham are at once Israel and "not Israel" (Rom. 9:6). Jesus has come; but have we accepted him and become his in spirit and in truth?

DEVOTIONAL SERVICE

BY EDWARD ARTHUR WICHER

Week Beginning December 14, 1913

TOPIC—The sheep and the goats. Matthew 25:31-46.

Matthew is a gospel of judgment. A solemn undertone of warning runs through it and sounds beneath its tenderest messages. It is the righteousness of God, seen in its twofold aspect of mercy and severity. John the Baptist announced the coming of the kingdom as a time of judgment, when the wheat should be separated from the chaff (3:12). At the opening of his ministry Jesus drew a sharp distinction between his disciples who were to constitute the true kingdom and the hypocritical Pharisees who pretended to be the kingdom (6:2, 5, 16), but would never enter it. He distinguished between the wise builder and the foolish and pointed to the disaster that must overtake the latter (7:24-27). In the parables of the tares (13:30) and the dragnet (13:47, 48) he foretold the ultimate separation of the good and the evil. In the parable of the laborers in the vineyard he prophesied the condemnation of the Jewish rulers (20:1-16). In the parable of the talents he declared the separation of the unprofitable servants from the profitable and their punishment. Here we have the final separation of the sheep and the goats. Throughout the book we hear the reverberating doom: "There shall be the weeping and the gnashing of teeth."

Matthew is a gospel of judgment, because it is the gospel of the Messiah. Judgment was inseparable from Messiahship. Jesus could not have been the Christ without being also the judge. Every higher way condemns the lower way. Every better thought condemns the worse thought. Christ could not appear without condemning the world. This was their condemnation, that light was come into the world and they preferred darkness rather than light.

The Jews expected that in the advent of the Messiah the gentiles would be judged. And the nations of the world were indeed present before the great tribunal, but the Jews were also there. The Christian community was also there; for the judgment embraced "all the tribes of the earth." Its sweep was universal. And the tests applied were of a kind that would be equally applicable to those who professed themselves followers of Christ and to those who had never heard his name.

There would seem to be two reasons for comparing the good and the bad to sheep and goats. The first reason is apparently their color. Sheep are usually white and goats are usually black. The second reason is that sheep are inoffensive and that goats are mischievous (Song of Solomon 4:1; 6:5). It is worthy of note also that the lamb was used in the sacrifice of the passover night, while the bearer of sins into the wilderness was the scapegoat.

Does this judgment seem terrible to us? Are we averse to listening to Christ as a voice of retribution? Nevertheless judgment is one of the first plain facts of the universe of God. And this judgment of Christ is wholly beneficent in its operation, as are all the judgments of God. It vindicates the supremacy of love over callous indifference, of patient sympathy with the suffering of others over slothful willingness to allow others to suffer for us. It pronounces the law of the survival of the fittest in character and serviceableness.

Every sentence in this judgment is determined by a reference to the judge himself. Every action is done, or not done, to the person of the judge. Jesus Christ is not only the incarnation of Deity, he is also in a profound sense the incarnation of humanity. The judge who sits upon the throne is not merely a man; he is the Son of man, he is man. He is identified in his interests and his being with the lowliest sons of humanity; so that whatever men do, or fail to do, to the poorest of their brethren, they do, or fail to do, to him. He has made himself to be one with men in all their weakness and vileness and sin.

Sometimes when we read the story of Jesus we are filled with a certain fierce resentment against the scribes and Pharisees. But are we so very different from them? Is there not in us also an underlying pride and a blind bigotry which would rebel against any pure teacher who might appear to show us that our deeds are evil?

But surely the spirit of Christ moving in the Christian centuries has made our hearts more tender, more receptive of his truth, more sympathetic toward his needy ones than were the hearts of men before he lived. We would like to be able to show our love to Jesus. We wish that Christ might be with us today that we could show how much kindlier, how much more sincere we are than were those old Jews.

Christ is here. He is in every sick and hungry man, in every suffering man. The intrusion of the reference to those in prison indicates that the words were written down in the days of persecution. Therefore we may see our Saviour in every persecuted man. We may see him in every brother who is out of work. We may see him in every haunting face in the terrible bread line. We may see him in every lonely widow trying to raise her little family. We may see him in every poor girl who is pressed and shadowed by the infamies of the street.

What are we doing to Jesus? Are we feeding him and comforting him and giving him a helping hand? Or are we wounding him afresh by our callous neglect and putting him to a public shame? Some day every secret deed of ours will be openly judged. God give us grace that when Christ shall return to judge the world we may stand before him with joy and not with grief.

There is no question asked in the day of judgment as to what church we have belonged to, as to whether we have subscribed to the proper confession of faith, and as to whether we have entertained prophets or been prophets. Not that these things are without moral value, but there is another question that goes beyond and includes them. Have we simply done deeds of charity? The ultimate test of the Christian heart is love. Where love is, there is Christ's law and there is Christ.

COMMENTS IN BRIEF BY WILLIAM T. ELLIS

THE REAL CHRISTMAS SPIRIT

TOPIC—The Christmas spirit and how it may prevail. Isaiah 9:2-7.

Christmas is more a spirit than a season. The keeping of it depends less upon the date —concerning which the Oriental and Occidental churches disagree—than upon an entrance into its real meaning of harmony and heartiness.

Whenever the Bethlehem Babe is born anew in a sense of the nearness of God and of the sanctity of childhood, there Christmas is kept indeed.

"Oh! don't you think that giving
Is just the best of living,
When everybody thinks of all the rest?"

Thus runs a modern Christmas refrain which is better preaching than it is poetry. The genius of this great festival is the gift spirit. It remembers the great Gift, when "God so loved the world that he gave his only Son." Out of that peerless giving spring all the lesser gifts of parents to children and of friend to friend. Christmas removes the center of interest and service from one's self to somebody else.

A new message was sounded to workingmen through their representatives the shepherds on Christmas eve. They were not forgotten. When the King came to his own, the toilers were the first to hear the news. Amid the lowly, in the stable of a khan, Jesus was born to the trade of his father, a carpenter. Then began that social revolution which has today put the man who toils into a position of power an honor.

"This is the gospel of labor,
Ring it, ye bells of the kirk;
For the Lord of love
Came down from above
To dwell with the men who work."

The business of war is surely being outlawed. The peace on earth promised at the first Christmas is being realized. The new world spirit of brotherhood has its springs in the manger. The reign of peace is coming through the reign of Christ. As he is enthroned in the ideals of civilization and in the hearts of men he is bringing in the glad day prophesied by the Christmas angels, when all men's good should be every man's aim.

To fail to take thought of little children at this season is to miss the very spirit of Christmas. And child or children there are somewhere this Christmas to everybody whose life is childless.

All of himself that he could crowd into mortal comprehension God embodied in Jesus Christ. Would you know what to think of the Infinite? Then look upon the Saviour, who came to us at Christmas.

This is the era of human welfare. Parliaments and congresses and legislatures everywhere are busy enacting laws for the promotion of the well-being of the common people. Social service is the day's keynote. The world has set itself to extirpate whatever hurts or destroys human happiness and health. Whence comes this new impulse which is transforming the earth? It took its rise in Bethlehem. The leader of this new crusade of chivalry is Jesus Christ. The better spirit of this new day is the very spirit of the Redeemer, born as one of the plain people, to lift them all up to a higher life. He inaugurated the reign of good will.

The Christmas bells are all attuned to the note of love. They reecho the joyous truth that "God is love" and that all his thoughts to usward are love thoughts. The Christ who came at Christmas is the Father's supreme expression of love for all his children.

To Add Interest to the Meeting

Many societies make no special effort to collect gifts for the poor at Christmas, depending on the service in the Sunday school for the participation of members in the "giving" part of the festival. The society as a whole might make a gift which could not be duplicated by transferring its meeting for the evening to the county jail or prison, to some home or infirmary where the inmates rarely hear hearty gospel hymns. Such a giving of time and energy would mean more to the members of the society than the contribution of half a dollar or a can of tomatoes to the dinner of some family, although there is joy, too, in that.

If the program committee has not had special music for some time this meeting offers a splendid opportunity. Let one or two members of the society sing the verses and have the whole society join in the chorus.

If any of the members are sick or in strange cities a postal from each of a dozen Endeavorers will be appreciated by the absent ones. Put the names and addresses on the bulletin board and announce the plan in meeting.

One of the secrets of happiness is found in the habitual emphasis of pleasant things, and the persistent casting aside of all malign elements. Men make their own world. We have read of a horticulturist who could not walk through a flower garden and see a rose bush covered with blossoms without searching until he found at least one blighted leaf. There are men who cannot look upon a great picture without scrutinizing every inch of the canvas for some light or shade to criticise, and afterwards they recall only the blemish. Yet there never was a tree so beautiful that it did not have one broken bough. There never was a book so wise but that it held one untruth or overstatement.—Newell Dwight Hillis.

MISSIONARY WORK

Wild Night for Lone Missionaries

There are still some people who think that Protestant churches ought not to send missionaries into the South American countries where the Roman Catholic Church claims to have Christianized the inhabitants centuries ago. But even those who maintain that these countries do not need missionaries cannot maintain that they offer a field too easy and comfortable to exercise missionary heroism. An experience which Mr. and Mrs. C. S. Williams recently suffered in Bucaramanga, Colombia, was far more exciting and dangerous than anything that a lone missionary would be likely to encounter in the remotest section of China or India. Indeed, it may safely be said that within the current year no other missionaries of the Presbyterian Church have been in such personal peril from mob violence as they.

The occasion of the Bucaramanga riot was the visit of a South American Protestant preacher. The South American people in most of the cities have become now pretty well used to the idea of foreigners preaching Protestantism and seldom molest them. But a native Argentine citizen who had been traveling through the other republics of South America appeared in Bucaramanga and asked the privilege of speaking in the local Protestant church, the "Salon Evangelico," as it is called there. The announcement of the service brought out a great crowd which packed not only all the sittings but all the standing room as well—an audience of probably 600 or 700 in all.

The speaker of the evening, Senor Peyronel, had barely introduced his address with a reference to the Waldensian Protestants in Italy, when a great commotion of screaming, yelling, groaning and hissing was heard in the street outside the building. Instantly the audience began to yell in unison with the outsiders, and the missionary himself had to take charge of the situation. By great firmness he succeeded within a few minutes in commanding quiet within the building, but this had barely been accomplished when the doors were burst open and a flying wedge from outside attempted to drive its way through the room. Pandemonium was then renewed and with outsiders fighting their way in and insiders trying to fight their way out, a terrific hubbub was occasioned.

Meanwhile a portion of the audience nearest the pulpit tried to get out across the platform by the rear doors leading to the missionaries' apartments. Here Mrs. Williams, however, in a desperate agony of effort to protect her sleeping babies, succeeded in holding the door shut by main strength and prevented an inrush into her rooms, which would probably have wrecked all the furniture, even if she and her children had escaped violence. The struggle in the church auditorium went on for fifteen minutes, when at length, under the sharp commands of Mr. Williams, the men nearest the street entrance succeeded in getting the doors closed. But the missionary then found some of the people inside the church very belligerent and was threatened with heavy billets of wood gathered up from his own woodpile. Nevertheless he continued boldly to face the crowd, and finally outfaced them, suffering no harm in the end, except the loss of the sticks of wood, which, with prudent forgetfulness, the rioters carried off for thrifty use in their own homes.

After all the excitement, Senor Peyronel made his speech, which proved far too dull and uninteresting to justify all this struggle for the privilege of presenting it. But the speech was delivered to the continuing accompaniment of howls from without. Naturally, the missionary was seriously concerned for what would happen when the meeting was ended and the lecturer and his auditors undertook to depart from the building. But happily the city authorities came to life before the speech was ended and a detachment of forty policemen arrived to clear the streets. And the better disposed of Senor Peyronel's auditors, responding to an appeal from Mr. Williams, pledged themselves to go home quietly and not quarrel with persons who might revile them. Moreover, some of the braver promised to surround Senor Peyronel on his way to his lodgings and keep off any attack upon him. This, with the police protection, afforded a sure and quiet end to the stormy evening.

The absurdity of the whole commotion was the more apparent because, in point of fact, the evening's address was in no sense an attack on the Roman Catholic Church, and included no obnoxious allusions.

A "Northfield" for Students in China

What the various student conferences at Northfield, Lake Geneva and other centers mean to American students, Chinese Christian students find in the conference which has now for nine consecutive years been held at Weihsien in Shantung province. The conference for 1913 occupied the last eight days of August. A year before the total attendance was sixty-one. This year 101 men were present. Forty of these came from Shantung Christian University. At the outset of the meetings the students were divided according to their personal preference into three separate commissions on Bible study, social service and public and personal evangelism. After five days of discussion severally these commissions formulated reports which were discussed by the entire body in attendance for the last three days of the gathering. The social service feature of the program was entirely new to the Chinese conference and awakened exceptional interest.

War of Family Against Christianity

Miss Katherine L. Schaeffer, representing Wisconsin young people's societies, writes from Southern Hainan: "We in the Kachek church have had many occasions to give thanks for answered prayer. Our latest is this: A young Mr. Tseng has been a believer for a number of months, but his parents and relatives have not allowed him to come to church, even beating him and drawing blood in the determination to keep him from becoming a Christian. He has all these months continued reading the Bible; he had the New Testament and then he came for Genesis; he did not want the whole of the Old Testament, and I did not at that time have Genesis by itself, so I cut it out of a whole Bible and gave it to him, later doing the same with Exodus. He said the whole book was too big for him to conceal under his jacket as he left home in the morning to take his flock of goats off to graze. A week ago he came here at midnight, having come prepared to stay here to work for his board, so he could have opportunity to study the Bible with other Christians. His mother, his wife and two aunts came and talked for two hours to get him to go home, saying his father and brethren were going to disown him if he did not come. We had a big 'palaver' and finally he said he would go home, but that he would return. Last Sunday he did return and reported that his people had promised to let him go to church. This was better than I had dared hope. I am glad that it has not been necessary for him to cut loose from his family, and I pray that by next year he will not be the only Christian in that home."

Persian Girls' Silence Criticised

That God's ways are not our ways, but infinitely better, was brought home to the friends of Iran Bethel Girls' School, Teheran, Persia, in connection with the last commencement. The teachers are grieved that their five Persian graduates would take no part in the public exercises, but the sight of these girls sitting mute and motionless while their classmates faced the great audience with the freedom and dignity of Christian girlhood brought out most forcibly the difference betwen Christianity and Islam. More than one Persian gentleman present felt and expressed shame at the situation. Two days later one of the Persian newspapers printed a very friendly account of the exercises and with reference to the Persian girls said: "Of course the customs of the religion must be maintained, but no one can produce any lawful reason why the Persian girls should not have delivered their essays; those present were much grieved not to have heard them." The fact that on a public occasion such a distinction was made between Christian and Moslem girls probably will ultimately do more for the cause of Christian womanhood in Persia than if Moslem traditions had not forced the distinction upon the attention of the public.

Duties of a Doctor's Wife in Persia

Describing the routine of work in Hamadan Mrs. Funk of the Lily Reid Holt Memorial hospital wrote recently: "This morning I spent much time putting away 140 pounds of soap. We are having cracked wheat prepared and that had to be given out to be cleaned and again put back under lock and key, and many little tasks that make no showing must be done. We have been having both wards pretty well filled and the private room occupied by the Swedish officer of the gendarmes. While he was here his food was prepared in our kitchen and later he took his meals at our table. The hospital servants can prepare only native food, which of course is what most of our patients want. There has been much typhoid and typhus fever, and now a great deal of smallpox among the children. Dr. Funk has vaccinated all the foreigners in the city against typhoid, which was felt to be necessary when the German druggist, who had lived here for nine years and 'never boiled his drinking water,' died."

Japanese Children Not Always Quiet

Miss Julia L. Leavitt of Tanabe, who has had unusual success in work among children these thirty years, since she went out herself little more than a child, writes of recent experiences: "The meetings for children in the three preaching places vary in numbers from thirty to seventy. Two are held in houses where families live and the children feel some constraint there, but they are very boisterous in the other house, which is rented only for them. We have put a few books and children's magazines in it, and some pictures on the dirty old walls—just magazine covers and illustrations. The one they all like best is the big crying-baby face from one of the monthly magazines. They have a grudge against the dreamy, delicate face in 'Bubbles' and took the tacks from the edge of the picture and stuck them in his eyes! I want something new to interest and help them."

Sunday Schools Popular at Chai Ryung

Four large Sabbath schools are held each Sunday at Chai Ryung, Korea, with an attendance of several hundred in each one. The number of Christians has grown so rapidly that no one building in the town can hold the people seeking instruction in the Bible, so both the Bible Institute building and the big city church are used twice on Sunday. Although the mission maintains no educational work there the Korean church has established a school for girls and another for boys, with two or three teachers each. This has been done by the Korean Christians in spite of the fact that Japan provides government schools free of cost except taxation. Many of the brighter boys and girls after finishing the school at Chai Ryung are sent by their parents or by the church to Pyeng Yang or Seoul.

Board Notes and Announcements

—Mrs. F. L. Selden of Ravenswood church led the meeting of the Board of the Northwest Friday morning in Room 48, Chicago. Mrs. Clow called her map talk on Persia "just an echo from the splendid letters and reports" that her missionary correspondents had sent. Mr. Hannaford of McCormick Seminary, preparing to return to Syria, gave the map talk on that field, telling much within a few minutes about the press, the hospitals, the "Anglo-American church" whose services are almost all in Arabic, and the college of 1,000 students. Rev. H. A. and Mrs. Whitlock of Ambala, India, and their children were heartily welcomed. The reason given by Moslem boys for no longer coming to a meeting reopened at their own urgent request was that the leader (Mrs. E. T. Lawrence, Kasvin, Persia, via Berlin and Tiflis), no longer gave them picture cards.

—The address of Rev. and Mrs. E. K. DeWitt, formerly of Teheran, is now Resht, Persia, via Berlin and Baku.

Travel and Nature Studies

A Traveler at Forty, by Theodore Dreiser. Americans as a rule unfortunately are not given to extensive traveling while young, so Mr. Dreiser's first venture into foreign parts will appeal to that large number of persons who have begun, or hope to begin, their traveling at the two-score milepost or later. Before Mr. Dreiser was 40 he had made a reputation as a brilliant novelist with his "Sister Carrie" and "Jennie Gerhardt," recently followed by a piece of lengthy biographical fiction, "The Financier." In his travels he had the advantage of the company of two interesting men, and the three formed a diverse but diverting trio. The result is a personal narrative decidedly out of the ordinary and brim full of refreshing experiences in London and Paris, the Riviera, Monte Carlo, Florence, Berlin, Amsterdam, and elsewhere. The impact of modern Europe on a modern mind—a mind keen and penetrating—is well worth consideration, whether or not time or purse permits of European wandering. Here is one of the striking volumes of the season. Mr. Dreiser devotes little time to statistical and architectural data which Baedeker supplies in accurate and undiluted doses. His concern is chiefly with folks and a study of their differences and similarities, compared with the people he left here at home. Take, for example, his entertaining sketches of restaurant and cafe life and his pen pictures of the unmoral and immoral characters he encountered in Paris and in London. After much careful observation he concludes that the life is too utterly feverish, artificial, and exotic, not to say dangerous and grimly destructive, if more than touched upon at long intervals. Probably the intervals had best be omitted entirely—healthy Americans can rest content with Mr. Dreiser's intimate descriptions. For the women he found there are of the kind that blight the race. Indeed there is altogether too much about women of this class to please the average clean-minded, unsophisticated reader. But Mr. Dreiser sees—or says he sees—things exactly as they are, without the gilding and veneer of the sentimentalist. He accepts no creeds, and he thinks people are both evil and well intentioned. His faculty for microscopic observation as well as shrewd generalization is amazing. The pictures are the peculiar, cloudy pen and ink work of W. Glackens—the fad with many editors and publishers nowadays. [Century Company, New York. $1.80 net.

Quebec, the Laurentian Province, by Beckles Willson. Discoursing pleasantly on things urban and suburban, the author has covered a wide range of topics, from the scarlet-hued Fameuse apple to the bilingual tendencies of the people. Quebec city, with its remarkable history, its unique and curious customs, its unsurpassed scenery, is a fruitful theme for writers of travel books. It is worthy of note, however, that Mr. Willson does not devote himself in excess to explaining the charm of the city, which is merely a starting place for incursions into localities fully as interesting but less familiar to the general reader. He takes us to places remote from the haunts of tourists; quiet, sequestered communities, whose only claim to renown lies in their historical setting, or in their pastoral seclusion from the hurly-burly of the centers of trade. A chapter devoted to the literature of the province presents a literary record of which Quebec is justly proud. Politics and political opinions are wisely excluded, and the book is fully illustrated. [Frederick A. Stokes Company, New York. $3.

An Artist in Italy, written and printed by Walter Tyndale. Mr. Tyndale calls his book a painter's record of the places he visited while in search of material for professional work; but an artist of such imaginative qualities as he possesses is almost never without a vivid sense of word values, and his volume has a value beyond its very striking paintings. It makes the reader "feel" Italy—which is the supreme art of a book of travel. Mr. Tyndale's trip was the result of a happy coincidence. He had longed for Italy with all the passion of the young student who felt himself forced to live by art in London for the rest of his days; and he took all the student's reverence and enthusiasm with him. As a result his book is charming—full of the color and poetry of a poetic country, and written with the poise of a literary man. There are about thirty brilliant full-page color plates and the volume is a quarto. [George H. Doran Company, New York. $5 net.

Japan as I Saw It, by A. H. Exner. Those interested in the kingdom of Nippon will be especially pleased with Mr. Exner's volume, which combines the features of a history and a book of travel. He takes up the more important cities, beginning with Nagasaki, the largest seaport, and dealing particularly with Kyoto, Yokohama and Tokyo. Shintoism and Buddhism, the two leading religious beliefs, are given interesting treatment. He describes the various industries, with special reference to the system of irrigation and drainage which has there been in operation for nearly 2,000 years. The art, mythology and literature of the country are all considered; and it is interesting to know that Shakespeare has been presented on the Japanese stage since 1879. Mr. Exner's book is a very comprehensive one and is splendidly illustrated. [Frederick A. Stokes Company, New York. $2.50 net.

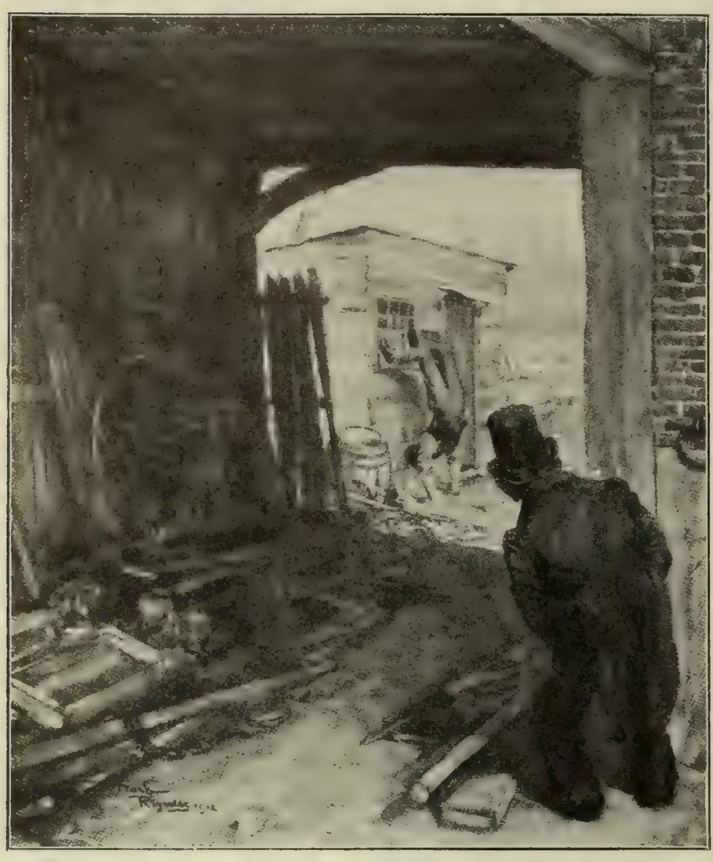
The Barbary Coast, by Albert Edwards. With three exceptions the sketches comprised in this volume have previously appeared in the pages of The Outlook. Delicately responsive to every impression, Mr. Edwards not only graphically describes the Moor and Mohammedan, but he possesses the rare gift of transmitting into print much of the Oriental atmosphere and picturesque charm. One feels that all-pervading, impenetrable mystery, elusive and baffling as the riddle of the sphinx, which enshrouds the East like a veil and is the secret of its fascination for us of the West. The book is intensely interesting, and none the less valuable because it does not assume to teach. [Macmillan Company, New York. $2 net.

Excursions, by Henry D. Thoreau, is the newest volume to be added to the edition of Thoreau's works which Clifton Johnson is illustrating with his camera. The long introduction by Emerson, consisting of a biographical sketch of the philosopher of Walden Pond, gives an added value to a book already notable. Mr. Johnson's pictures have been chosen from the Concord country to which Thoreau was so passionately devoted, and they visualize the charm of it as very few photographs have done. An ideal gift book. [Thomas Y. Crowell Company, New York. $2 net.

The Meccas of the World: The Play of Modern Life in New York, Paris, Vienna, Madrid and London, by Anne Warwick. This author has vivacity, penetration and sympathy, and when she sets herself to discussing the characteristics of these world capitals she is irresistible. Her chapters on the New York skyscraper, "Miss New York, Jr.," the "everyday performances" of Paris, the Vienna "that never grows up," and London cosmopolitanism are vividly and originally done. An attractive gift book for traveled persons. [John Lane Company, New York. $2 net.

Picturesque New Zealand, by Paul Gooding, is an elaborately decorative volume dealing seriously with this fascinating country and its people, though merely touching up the absorbing question of sociological and industrial conditions. The author's object has been to offer a panoramic view rather than a guidebook. The collection of photographs is invaluable and the most beautiful we've ever seen of New Zealand. [Houghton Mifflin Company, Boston. $3.50 net.

The Panama Canal, by Earle Harrison. The volume is unique by virtue of its valuable autochrome photographs taken by the author on the scenes of action. An illuminating description accompanies each picture, and the binding and general make-up are of the gift book type. These photographs are worth owning and preserving, for they can never be secured again in just this stage of the canal's development. [Moffat, Yard and Company, New York. $1 net.



QUILP'S WHARF

From Dickens' "The Old Curiosity Shop" Copyright, 1913, George H. Doran Co., N. Y.

Athens and Its Monuments, by Charles Heald Weller, is designed to provide a brief and untechnical account of the topography and monuments of ancient Athens for the general reader and the traveler as well as an introduction to the subject for the student of archæology and history. It is the result of extensive research during residence in Athens and will make a satisfactorily concise guidebook. Adequately illustrated with charts, maps and photographs and handsomely bound. [Macmillan Company, New York. $4 net.

Travels Without Baedeker, by Adern Beaman, is an unconventional account of the experiences of the author, who started out to see as much of the world as possible on "£41." He discourses most entertainingly upon his travels in Egypt, Greece and Southern Europe, where, "owing to the low state of the exchequer," he came into close contact with the common people. While his adventures were not always pleasant, he treats them humorously, giving many interesting glimpses of the prevailing customs and manners of the masses, who in reality represent the national types. [John Lane Company, New York. $2 net.

Hunting the Elephant in Africa, by C. H. Stigand; with foreword by Theodore Roosevelt, comprises recollections of Captain Stigand's thirteen years' wanderings as naturalist, explorer and hunter of big game. The volume is full of thrills and information and is profusely illustrated from photographs. [Macmillan Company, New York. $2.50 net.

Old Countries Discovered Anew: A Motor Book for Everybody, by Ernest Talbert. The automobile has made possible the real conquest of remote portions of countries. Mr. Talbert has availed himself of its possibilities in the highways and byways of Holland, Germany and France, and offers the delights of his tour as a guidebook for other sightseers. His enthusiasm is contagious and his background of history and association is helpful to those who may take his book with them on similar travels. Fully illustrated with photographs, maps and routes. [Dana Estes Company, Boston, $2 net.

The Coming Canada, by Joseph King Goodrich. A very informing account of Canada's early history, present status and future possibilities, illustrated from photographs not taken by the author himself but supplied by the officials of the great railway systems. Mr. Goodrich seems to have made a thorough study of conditions, however, and the person in search of ready information will find it here. [A. C. McClurg and Company, Chicago. $1.50.

Sand Dunes and Salt Marshes, by C. W. Townsend. This title applies to the interesting country of Ipswich, Mass., where the author has been going for twenty years. His book is not a technical study but simply a record of the fascinations he found in his various explorations. People who have no enthusiasm for dunes and marshes had better read this account, for it endows them with extraordinary beauties. The illustrations are from photographs and diagrams. [Dana Estes and Company, Boston. $2 net.

A Sturdy Little Northland, by T. Harold Grimshaw, describes the Shetland Isles and their people, giving a vivid impression of this "woefully sterile land with scarcely an apology for a tree," but an abundance of beautiful heather, primroses and bluebells and some enchanting summer days. Some of the experiences related are too personal to interest the casual reader. [Methodist Book Concern, New York. 75 cents net.

Holiday Editions of Old Favorites

The Old Curiosity Shop, by Charles Dickens; illustrated by Frank Reynolds. Of all the new editions that the year has brought forth this one will stand at the very top of the list. Mr. Reynolds has already shown that he has no rival as an interpreter of Dickens and this new quarto volume takes its place immediately as a worthy successor to the others that have gone before it. There are twenty-one rich full-pages of color showing Little Nell, her grandfather, Dick Swiveller, Kit, Mr. and Mrs. Quilp, Mrs. Jarley and all the rest of the familiar characters. The conceptions of Little Nell are poignantly beautiful. In type, binding and pictures these books are the most tastefully elaborate editions of Dickens one can buy. [George H. Doran Company, New York. $5.

Kidnapped, by Robert Louis Stevenson, is a companion volume to "Treasure Island" which N. C. Wyeth illustrated last year and is even more attractive than that volume. Mr. Wyeth's sense of color is stirringly vivid, his drawing excellent and his imagination of the vigorously romantic type suitable for adventure on the high seas — particularly Stevensonian adventure. In every respect this is a typical Scribner book, which classification means taste and beauty. [Charles Scribner's Sons, New York. $2.25 net.

Parsifal; or, The Legend of the Holy Grail, retold from ancient sources with acknowledgment to the "Parsifal" of Richard Wagner, by T. W. Rolleston; illustrated in color by Willy Pogany. It's safe to say that "Parsifal" has never been given such a magnificent edition as this one. The volume is octavo and the letterpress is in gray on pages with exquisite decorative designs in brown. The colored plates by the celebrated Hungarian artist are supremely artistic in technique, though at time somewhat cheap in conception. There are numerous autolithographs and line drawings. [Thomas Y. Crowell Company, New York. $6 net.

The Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam, illustrated in color and decorated by Willy Pogany. Mr. Pogany is far more at home in the Rubaiyat atmosphere than in that of Parsifal and his paintings here are exquisite. Two years ago these publishers issued an expensive edition de luxe of the Persian classic with these same illustrations; and now, to meet a popular demand for it, they have reduced the size and thickness of the pages and offer it at a ridiculously low price. It is preeminently the edition to choose for a gift. [Thomas Y. Crowell Company, New York. $1.50 net.

The Chimes, by Charles Dickens; illustrated in color by Hugh Thomson. A delightful medium-sized edition that ought to be tremendously popular as a gift book. Mr. Thomson's art needs no fresh praise; but it is so subtle and delicate an art that it can never be overpraised. There's one picture here of Mr. and Mrs. Tugby before the fire that conveys a more vivid sense of hearthside warmth and comfort than it seems possible to wrest from mere paint tubes. [George H. Doran Company, New York. $1.50 net.

Tom Brown's School Days, by Thomas Hughes; with a preface by Lord Kilbracken; edited by F. Sedgwick. The most interesting edition of "Tom Brown" ever published, as it contains photographs of the scenes where the story is laid, photographs of the author, his relatives and many of his book characters, rare contemporary prints and diagrams of Rugby at the time of Tom's sojourn there—between 1834 and 1841. [G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York. $3 net.

Lorna Doone, by D. R. Blackmore. This is a handsome holiday edition of a classic produced more than a generation ago. The story of Lorna Doone has not lost any of its charm and lov-

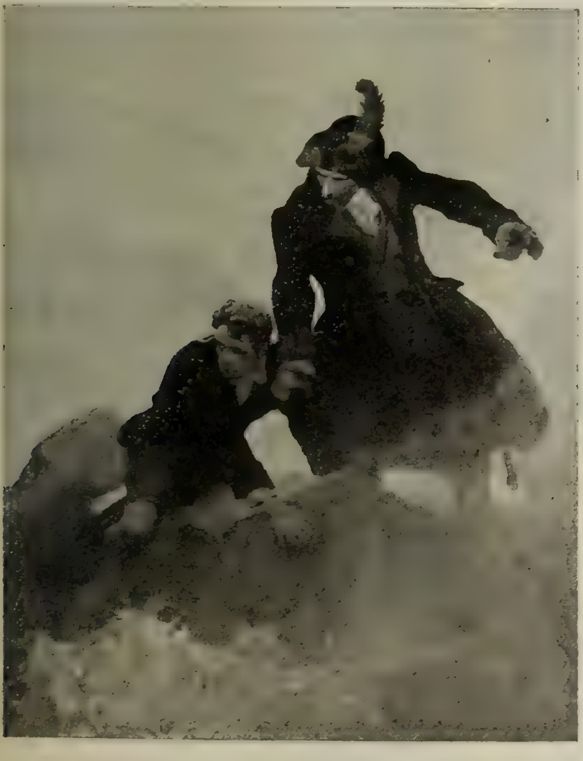
Ramona, by Helen Hunt Jackson; with introduction by A. C. Vroman. This is a tourist's edition of one of our most popular American classics, illustrated from photographs of its actual scenes. A real value attaches to the volume, for many of the much-discussed inconsistencies as to locations appear to have been explained authoritatively. The photographs are interesting aside from their historic function, having been taken by a man who knows how to get effects. [Little, Brown and Company, Boston. $2 net.

Christmas Stories and A Christmas Carol, by Charles Dickens; both illustrated in color by Spencer Baird Nichols. The second volume is simply taken, illustrations and all, from the first one for the sake of those readers who wish to buy the "Christmas Carol" separately. The first one contains, besides, "The Chimes," "The Cricket on the Hearth," "The Battle of Life," "The Haunted Man" and "The Ghost's Bargain." The illustrations are effective. [Frederick A. Stokes Company, New York. $1.60 net and 75 cents.

The Happy Prince, and Other Stories, by Oscar Wilde; illustrated by Spencer Baird Nichols. Contains besides the story named in the title "The Nightingale and the Rose," "The Selfish Giant," "The Young King," "The Star-Child," "The Fisherman and His Soul" and "The Birthday of the Infanta." Some of the color plates are very striking, others slightly banal; but on the whole the edition is pleasing. [Frederick A. Stokes Company, New York. $1.50 net.

The Story of Evangeline, adapted from Longfellow by Clayton Edwards; illustrated by M. L. Kirk. A prose version followed by the original poem, both of which are inadequately illustrated in color by an artist of sentimentality and no imagination. The book is planned on a large and interesting scale, and it is regrettable that it should have been so marred. [Frederick A. Stokes Company, New York. $2 net.

Tales from Washington Irving's Traveller; with illustrations by George Hood. This is a very desirable volume except for the illustrations, which are wooden, vapid and utterly crude in technique. Why a book so full of interest should have left its artist uninspired is hard to understand. [J. B. Lippincott Company, Philadelphia. $2.50 net.



THE TORRENT IN THE VALLEY OF GLENCOE
From Stevenson's "Kidnapped" Copyright, 1913, Charles Scribner's Sons, N.Y.

Fairy Tales: The Happy Prince, The Young King, The Star-Child, The Selfish Giant, The Nightingale and the Rose, The Devoted Friend, The Remarkable Rocket, the Birthday of the Infanta, The Fisherman and His Soul, by Oscar Wilde. A simple, unpretentious edition with a colored frontispiece and three or four black and white sketches. [G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York. $1.25 net.

Art and Artists

The Gospel Story in Art, by John LaFarge. There is a threefold interest in this magnificent volume — first, that it gives more completely than we have ever had it before the Christian story in art; second, that it has been written by an artist peculiarly equipped for such a task, Mr. LaFarge having been born and educated in the older faith of Christendom and having had at his finger tips the most comprehensive knowledge of the master paintings which tell the gospel story; and third, that it is the last work of one of our most eminent American artists. Mr. LaFarge had the idea in mind many years before he actually began work on it and he finished the volume so shortly before his death there was no time for the revision he had hoped for. There appears to be no room for improvement, however, and the work will take its place immediately as one of the most valuable and scholarly critiques of Christianity in art ever produced. The reproductions of celebrated paintings have been made with especial care, and the printing and binding are superlatively tasteful. [Macmillan Company, New York. $5.

A Short History of Art, by Julia B. De Forest; edited, revised and largely rewritten by Charles H. Caffin. Both in text and pictures this is one of the most compactly exhaustive studies of painting, architecture and sculpture from primitive times to the present ever published. Based upon Miss De Forest's standard work, it preserves the original volume of her research and creates a definite new standard, for Mr. Caffin is one of the most authoritative and distinguished art critics in this country and he has brought the study sufficiently down to date to include the latest developments in America, England, Germany and France. He refuses to commit himself in regard to post-impressionism, except to say that its devotees are still in the "groping" stage. If one is to buy only one history of art this would seem preeminently the one to choose. There are over 300 illustrations. [Dodd, Mead and Company, New York. $3 net.

Personal Recollections of Vincent Van Gogh, by Elizabeth Du Quesne Van Gogh; translated by Katherine S. Dreier, with foreword by Arthur B. Davies. Van Gogh is a post-impressionist—one of the most interesting of that school—who died twenty-three years ago after a short lifetime of poverty, seething ambitions, hideous discouragements and misunderstandings, terrific work and intervals of illness and insanity. He was not, as is commonly believed of his school, an ignoramus or an impostor. He had probed deeply into literature, philosophy, science and art; he was a linguist of distinction, and he had a remarkable capacity for concentrated study. All this throws a different light upon his work. His sister tells his story with the quaintest simplicity and earnestness, and the book is well worth reading. There are a number of illustrations, none of which indicates that he is a "wild man" in the least. Some of them—in fact most of them—are sanely beautiful. [Houghton Mifflin Company, Boston. $1.75 net.

FIVE HUNDRED FEET UP AND STILL CLIMBING!
From "The Meccas of the World" Copyright, 1913, John Lane Co., N. Y.

Mont St. Michel and Chartres, by Henry Adams, with introduction by Ralph Adams Crane. A study of two great French cathedrals privately printed in 1904 and now reissued in a form that will bring great joy to the art and history specialist. The detail of the study necessitates a full consideration of mediævalism in France, and Mr. Adams's unquestioned scholarship has contributed a fresh and valuable work on the subject. The book is beyond the range of the layman, but it ought to have serious consideration from the student. Profusely illustrated. [Houghton Mifflin Company, Boston. $6 net.

Art in Spain and Portugal, by Marcel Dieulafoy. A new volume in the well-known "General History of Art" series in which the painting, architecture, sculpture and allied arts of these two countries are considered by an eminent authority and illustrated by several hundred small photographic reproductions. Microscopically informing. [Charles Scribner's Sons, New York. $1.50 net.

Heraldry for Craftsmen and Designers, by W. H. St. John Hope. The principles of heraldry are fully covered in this volume and made so simple that a few hours' careful study of the designs and text will serve to acquaint the student with the essential points. Profusely illustrated with diagrams, collotype reproductions and colored lithographs. [Macmillan Company, New York. $2.25 net.

Music and Musicians

Symphonies and Their Meaning, by Philip H. Goepp. This third volume in a most excellent series takes up the study of the modern symphony. Beginning with the early nineteenth century its development is traced through Berlioz, Liszt, Tschaikowsky, Rachmaninow, Strauss, Dvorak, Bruckner, Sibelius, Mahler and those innovators who are still more or less unaccepted by the traditionists—Cesar Frank, D'Indy, Debussy, Dukas. There are chapters of enormous interest on the symphonic poems of Liszt, Saint-Saens, Hugo Wolff and Smetana, a thorough consideration of the Italian school and also of the symphony in America associated with such names as Hadley, Strube, Chadwick and Loeffler. For the musical student in search of definitely technical material this book (and its predecessors) are as good as any we know. [J. B. Lippincott Company, Philadelphia. $2 net.

Copyright, 1913, Houghton Mifflin Co., Boston

Days with the Great Composers is a book of informal little journeyings to the homes of Chopin, Wagner and Gounod—perfectly imaginative visits, of course, based upon a study of their lives and letters. The net result of this informal treatment is a delicious humanity, as for instance when we're introduced to Chopin: "About 9 o'clock one April morning . . . a thin, undersized, slightly built man, of delicate, almost effeminate physique was trifling somewhat fastidiously with his coffee and roll, and devoting considerable attention to the flowers which adorned his table." With the exception of some technical vulgarities—such as the unnecessary use of "on dit" for the plain English phrase—the volume of admirable. It will make these three masters far less remote as geniuses and much more human as men. The colored illustrations, pictorial cover and general make-up suggest that the book ought to serve gift purposes. [George H. Doran Company, New York. $1.50 net.

Christmas Stories

Under the Christmas Stars, by Grace S. Richmond. From the softly lighted, snow-covered house on the cover to the end of the story, which tells of the birth of a little child on Christmas night, this little book is a pure gem of love and beauty, full of the rich meaning of the Christmas time. Its people are a group of married sons and daughters who gather at the old homestead for the holidays. Most of them are inclined to pass superficial judgments on the western bride of the most recently married son; but Molly's grit and wholesomeness and skill save the life of the little new child and win her a way into their hearts. It is charmingly done and preaches its lesson so sweetly that one isn't conscious of being preached at. Just the sort of Christmas story the home folks will want. Illustrated by Alice Barber Stephens. [Doubleday, Page and Company, New York. 50 cents.

Their Christmas Golden Wedding, by Caroline Abbot Stanley. On the day before Christmas an old civil war veteran and his wife "elope" from the fine homes of their married children, where they've been living uncomfortably for a year, and go back to their deserted homestead to live out the rest of their lives happily. The whole family assemble there for a good old-fashioned dinner on Christmas day and wisely decide that their parents know how to manage their lives more pleasantly than it can be done for them. A delightful gift for grandparents—or their children. [Thomas Y. Crowell Company, New York. 50 cents.

The Christmas Bishop, by Winifred Kirkland. A well-written "sentiment" story with value above the average, telling of a big-hearted Episcopal bishop who spends Christmas day trying to help three human beings who mean much to him. What he conceives to be his failure is shown to be very richly the opposite. There are attractive illustrations. [Small, Maynard and Company, Boston. $1 net.

The Three Godfathers, by Peter B. Kyne. Out in the California desert the Christmas legend is relived in the birth of a child, its lonely mother's death and her intrustment of her baby to the only available human beings—three of the wildest "bad men" robbers in the community. The legacy has the expected effect of conversion. The local color is vivid and the language of the roughest, but the story is worth while. [George H. Doran Company, New York. $1 net.

The Stranger at the Gate: A Story of Christmas, by Mabel Osgood Wright. An obvious but not unpleasing story of a man and woman who, for years having missed the joy and meaning of life, are suddenly jerked up short into realization at Christmas time. [Macmillan Company, New York. $1.25 net.

Next Christmas, by Byron E. Veatch. A touching and human little sermon on the folly of putting off good resolutions till "next Christmas." Its central figure is a man who learns how to make money and forgets nearly everything else for a while. [F. G. Browne and Company, Chicago. 50 cents.

The "Funny" Books

Mr. Togo: Maid of All Work, by Wallace Irwin. Without exaggeration, these are the most humorous and clever Japanese stories ever written. They are told by the Japanese servant himself in the form of letters to a magazine which he salutes thus: "To editor Woman's page who make bright talk on dusty subjects." They reveal the soulful Mr. Togo's efforts to secure—and keep—employment; and each of them ends somewhat in this fashion: "So I project myself away feeling quite absorbed like a sponge. Hoping you are the same. . . ." Nothing just like them has ever been done before. Mr. Irwin is a genius at it. [Duffield and Company, New York. $1.25 net.

Whistler Stories, collected and arranged by Don C. Seitz. Here are seemingly hundreds of anecdotes, each containing a Whistler witticism, from the famous "Why drag in Velasquez" mot to many that are less familiar or quite new. Some few of them are rather unhumorous, but the majority are typical Whistler gems. There's a frontispiece portrait and the volume is pocket size, attractively bound in plain red. [Harper and Brothers, New York. Cloth, 75 cents; leather, $1 net.

The Jingle-Jungle Book, by Oliver Herford. A new book of limericks typical of Mr. Herford's special cleverness and amusingly illustrated by him in full-page black and white sketches. As a sample we quote "The Omnivorous Bookworm":

Quoth the bookworm, "I don't care one bit
If writers have wisdom or wit;
  A volume must be
  Pretty dull to bore me
As completely as I can bore it."

[Century Company, New York. $1 net.

Christmas Calendars and Cards

Four of the most attractive calendars of the season come from the George H. Doran Company. They are Life's Calendar, with a front cover in colors by Relyea, six leaves in color by Angus McDonald, Orson Lowell, Victor Anderson and others; The James Montgomery Flagg Calendar, with seven interesting pages of the popular New York artist's drawings in color; The Charles Dana Gibson Calendar, with seven sheets of typical though not supremely good Gibson drawings in black and white; and The E. Coles Phillips Calendar, also with seven colored plates in Mr. Phillips's unique "lineless" style. Each is boxed and hung on a heavy silk cord. [George H. Doran Company, New York. Each $2 net.

Dutton's Christmas Booklets, Calendars, Postcards, etc., come this year in their usual rich variety. The calendars are in many forms suitable to practical use, separately or in combination with diary blanks. All are tastefully printed in colors. The booklets and cards show a number of novelties. One little booklet for Christmas use has for its text a quotation from Dr. Jowett. The forehanded in preparing for Christmas will be wise to make sure of an early inspection of these publications. [E. P. Dutton Company, New York.

The Pastor-Preacher Calendar for 1914, with record of engagements and activities. A quotation for every week by William A. Quayle. 52 pages. [Methodist Book Concern, New York.

Gospel Text Calendar, 1914. Sixteen pages; colors. [H. S. Hallman, Berlin, Ont. 25 cents.

Various Gift Books

Fellowship Books: A New Contribution by Various Writers toward the Expression of the Human Ideal and Artistic Faith of Our Own Day, edited by Mary Stratton. The Quest of the Ideal, by Grace Rhys; Childhood, by Alice Meynell; Romance, by Ernest Rhys; Freedom, by A. Martin Freeman; Solitude, by Norma Gale; A Spark Divine: A Book for Animal Lovers, by R. C. Lehmann; and The Joy of the Theatre, by Gilbert Cannan, are the first volumes in a new series which is built upon a delightful foundation. Each one is to be a "fresh statement of the truths that make life worth living" and each is contributed by a well-known author, artist, poet or publicist who has a positive enthusiasm for his topic. They are published in gift form and are highly attractive as well as valuable. [E. P. Dutton and Company, New York. Each 75 cents.

Japanese Flower Arrangement, by Mary Averill ("Kivashinsai Kiyokumai"). One of the most fascinating of recent books is this charming treatise on flower arrangement written by a Japanese girl. She came to America last winter and her many lectures to an interested group of society women in New York proved so popular that it was decided to publish them. There is a wonderful charm in the way the Japanese arrange their flowers, for with them it is an exact science. Following this art from youth has given the Japanese an idea of proportion, says the author, has taught them the power of concentration and one might almost say imbued them with many of their finest traits of character. The book contains very complete directions for grouping blooms and blossoms and for use of different kinds of vases; also how best to prolong the life of cut flowers. There are eighty-eight drawings to illustrate the different ideas in flower arrangement. [John Lane Company, New York. $1.50.

LOITERER'S HARVEST, by E. V. Lucas Among the discriminating few, at least, a new volume by Mr. Lucas finds ready welcome. This one is a collection of short essays that have a touch of the whimsicality and charm characterizing the author's popular "Over Bemerton's." When Mr. Lucas writes on "disappearing London" he exclaims: "You must make haste, you who love old London, for everything is against you—time and the elements are against you, and man and what he quaintly calls civilization and progress are against you." This quotation epitomizes in brief his philosophy, his attitude toward life. One of the most adventurous things left to us, Mr. Lucas thinks, is going to bed. "For no one can lay a hand on our dreams." [Macmillan Company, New York. $1.25 net.

THE FOUR SEASONS, by Carl Ewald. Among the attractive gift books of the season must be listed this fanciful tale of the earth's formation and the origin of the seasons, from the pen of Denmark's celebrated classic symbolist. Although designed for grown people, the language employed is so simple and the style so unstudied that children will delight in it, especially those passages dealing with bird, flower and animal life. The fidelity with which all natural phenomena are presented will win the approval of the scientifically inclined. Dainty page decorations and appropriate illustrations add to the attractiveness of the volume, which has been ably rendered into English by Alexander Teixeira De Mattos. [Dodd, Mead and Company, New York. $1.20 net.

OUR FRIEND THE DOG, by Maurice Maeterlinck; illustrated in color by Cecil Alden. Maeterlinck's profound yet graceful essay on the dog and his relation to human beings has been brought out in a very attractive new edition with pictures by that inimitable artist, Cecil Alden. For the dog lover, for the thoughtful man or woman who likes to reflect upon the psychic bond between the human and the canicular realms this will be an ideal gift. [Dodd, Mead and Company, New York. $1.25 net.

THE CONFESSIONS OF A DEBUTANTE, with illustrations by R. M. Crosby. The vivacious record of a young French girl's "coming out" in New York and the gay winter she spends there, culminating in her engagement to an American of sterling qualities. Although devoted to an almost hectic round of pleasure, the book and its heroine are wholesome and it will make a suitable gift for any girl who has an interest in society and its doings. [Houghton Mifflin Company, New York. $1 net.

THE HEART OF THE ROSE, by Mabel A. McKee. This is a story reprinted from The Continent which every mother will want her son or daughter to read. It was recently reviewed in the editorial columns of this paper. [Fleming H. Revell Company, New York. 25 cents.

New Juveniles

LITTLE WARS, by H. G. Wells. The famous novelist whose imaginative force and skill have made him one of the best known writers of this generation, is an inventor and devotee of floor and lawn games—juvenile pastimes "for boys from 12 years of age to 150"—also for "that more intelligent sort of girls who enjoy boys' books." The possibilities of play with toy soldiers have been systematically and delightfully developed by Mr. Wells, so that campaigns may be fought with the aid of cardboard bridges, improvised forts and chalked-out rivers. It is more fun than chess and in a way just as scientific and absorbing. The rules are sufficiently complicated to satisfy adult intellects, and the author thinks he has devised a thoroughly satisfactory substitute for real war. [Small, Maynard and Company, Boston. $1.20 net.

THE GOODY-NAUGHTY BOOK, by Sarah Cory Rippey, is a real novelty in children's books. You read through it from one direction and find all about "Willie Won't," Mollie who pouted, the "I forgot" imp, the "going to" club, and so on, until you come suddenly upon an upside-down page in the middle of the book that says "turn over." So there's nothing to do but to turn the book about and begin reading from the other end. Then you find out all about some good little people and the things they do. This is a book that children will enjoy and find moral incentive in too, for the "goodies" are not so priggish that any honest child would want to fly from them, nor are the "naughties" so exceedingly villainous as to be beyond the child's ordinary range of experience. Altogether, here is a collection of dear normal children who do normal things, sometimes nice and sometimes not, but who make excellent playmates for the small folk. Very artistically illustrated in color and black and white by Blanche Fisher Wright. [Rand, McNally and Company, Chicago. 50 cents net.

THE SWISS FAMILY ROBINSON, by Johann David Wyss; illustrated in color by T. H. Robinson. Uniform with Mr. Robinson's "Grimm's Fairy Tales" and "Robinson Crusoe" this volume has been eagerly awaited and will be given an enthusiastic welcome. The artist has an extraordinary color sense and this classic gives him a splendid opportunity. [George H. Doran Company, New York. $2.

The Girl Who Works: A Book for Parents, Educators and Young People

CLARA E. LAUGHLIN

THE WORK-A-DAY GIRL, by Clara E. Laughlin. Of all the season's books none presents a problem of more vital interest to men or women interested in social betterment than this. Mrs. Gertrude Howe Britton, superintendent of the Chicago Juvenile Protective Association, whose wide experience with girls gives authority to her statements, speaks of the book in the highest terms. Referring to the chapter entitled "The Price of Progress," she said: "I regard it as a masterpiece; never before has woman's position in the home been so ably presented." It is a book of wide scope, and not only truthfully depicts present-day conditions but offers many practical suggestions to the earnest-minded who want to help solve this problem of the girl wage earner. Miss Laughlin has gathered her material from a variety of sources, but a large portion of it is taken from the testimony given in the sessions of the night court she attended. While thus engaged she became convinced that industrialism was less to blame for female delinquency than "the slipshod, ignorant, ill-governed homes," which every year are unloading "more and more spoiled and spoiling products" on the state to be made into useful citizens through the medium of its reformatories and prisons. Modern investigation has exploded the old fallacy that most girls work for pin money, and it is now known that four-fifths of those who work turn over their earnings to the family. In this connection Miss Laughlin has some especially illuminating things to say:

"The notion that money paid to girl workers was in the nature of a contribution to their candy and feather fund seemed deeply imbedded in many minds—especially in the minds of those who employ girl labor. On one hand were outcries against the small wages paid to girl workers and demands for minimum wage legislation. On the other hand were retorts that girl workers were inefficient, undependable and worth no more than the small sums for which they willingly sold their labor. In studying the pros and cons of minimum wage legislation, it became evident that girls are indeed ill prepared for that industrial phase which most of them now enter upon for a longer or shorter period; and also that they are ill paid, usually, even for the kind of service they render. A tragic proportion of them are not paid enough to keep body and soul together. The deficit must always be made up. Who pays it? That led to some startling revelations and disclosed an astoundingly prevalent conviction that women have always been 'supported' by someone other than themselves; that their labor has never been reckoned worth their 'keep,' but that the difference has been obligingly made up by somebody."

Doubtless there will be some people who will object to Miss Laughlin's plain speaking; but clean, high-minded men and women in whose hearts is to be found the love of God and humanity are never afraid of the truth. They recognize that this state of affairs which is menacing society can never be checked unless faced honestly. Miss Bartelme, assistant judge of the Cook county juvenile court, says of Miss Laughlin that "she is inspired in her ability to analyze and plainly to set forth the motives, desires, emotions and struggles of her fellow beings. I wish the book could be studied by every educator, by boys and girls in the seventh and eighth grades and by their parents. . . . One who really wishes to help, to be of some use in life, need only to read this book and he will know how and where he can be of service. I consider each of the last two chapters among the best short stories ever written." [Fleming H. Revell Company, New York. $1.50 net.

THE FAMILY BREADWINNER

She has been "laid off" and doesn't know where to look for another job

From "The Work-a-Day-Girl" Copyright, 1913, Fleming H. Revell Co., N. Y.

Dulac. This is one of the year's rarely beautiful volumes for children; to many people it will be "first choice" of all the gift juveniles. Mr. Dulac is the celebrated artist who, with Arthur Rackham, shares honor of having produced in the last three or four years something absolutely new in the art of book illustrations. These plates are wonderful things, full of a subtle depth and richness of coloring that even Mr. Rackham doesn't achieve. The stories include "The Real Princess," "The Emperor's New Clothes," and "The Wind's Tale." [George H. Doran Company, New York, $2.

Famous Frontiersmen and Heroes of the Borders: Their Adventurous Lives and Stirring Experiences in Pioneer Days, by Charles H. L. Johnston. Here is a book full of information not easily obtainable, for it deals with neglected as well as well-known pioneer heroes. Among them are the following names: Daniel Morgan, James Harrod, Robert McLellan, Colonel Benjamin Logan, George Rogers Clarke, John Slover, Captain Jack Hays and many others. Interestingly illustrated with photographs and drawings and dedicated to the boy scouts of the world. [L. C. Page and Company, Boston. $1.50.

The Bible Story and Its Teaching for Children, by Baroness Freda DeKnoop. A thoughtful, beautifully conceived presentment of the gospel story with special emphasis on its visualization in the art masterpieces of the world. The large colored plates are reproduced from the paintings of the old masters. Handsomely bound; suitable for the child of 14 and upwards. [E. P. Dutton and Company, New York. $2.50 net.

The Perry Boys: "A Social Center-Historical" Play in Three Scenes for Ten Boys, by Harold Strong Latham. Realizing the dearth of material in the field of plays for boys (there is so much with musical settings and so little with straight action) Mr. Latham has written a little drama about boy-club life which has recently been presented very successfully by the boys in the club of which he is supervisor. It's a simple, wholesome play based upon the idea of the social service boys who have the good things of life may render those who are without them. It ought to be heartily welcomed by parents who strive to keep their sons actively interested in healthy pastimes. [Samuel French, New York. 25 cents net.

Books with New Light on Missions

Find on your map the republic of Paraguay and the river by the same name. West of this river, between 23 and 24 south latitude, lies a section occupied by a number of Indian tribes and known as the Chaco; the principal village is Waikthlatingmangyalwa. Here came W. Barbrooke Grubb, representing the South American Missionary Society of the Church of England, nearly a quarter of a century ago. In A Church in the Wilds (E. P. Dutton and Company, New York; illustrated; $1.50 net) he describes his remarkable experiences in the building up of a mission that turned the savage tribes of the Chaco toward higher civilization. It has been a slow work against tremendous odds, and it would seem that still only a beginning has been made; but no one could read this intensely interesting book, frankly written, but always in a humble spirit, without rejoicing in the heroic service of its author. Though this work is in a section with which American churches have not been concerned, Mr. Grubb's methods of dealing with primitive pagans are worthy the study of all who are interested in missions.

A book of different type is Jungle Days, by Arley Munson, M. D. (D. Appleton and Company, New York; illustrated, $2.50 net). Miss Munson when still a young girl determined to give her life to the uplift of the women and children of India; and to that country she went after receiving her medical preparation. Disappointed in government service because it would permit no teaching of Christianity, she accepted the superintendency of a Wesleyan hospital at Medak and there she rounded out her five years' experience. The book is neither a biography, a study, nor a polemic on missions, but a sparkling story of what a true-hearted, deeply sympathetic, vivacious American woman saw and felt in India. It is rich in anecdotal material and the pictures are exceptionally interesting.

The sixteen years spent by Donald Fraser among the Ngoni, Senga and Tumbuka peoples of central Africa would not have been wasted if they had brought no other results than Among a Primitive People (E. P. Dutton and Company, New York; illustrated; $1.50 net). Mr. Fraser's work lay in Nyassaland, west and south of Lake Nyassa, where he was associated with the Livingstonia mission. His book describes in straightforward, always modest but ever-interesting manner the marvels God hath wrought through missionary effort among peoples fully as deep in darkness as those among whom the ubiquitous Dan Crawford spent his years of service. It is a tremendously informing book and inspiring, too. Where can one find a better statement of the fruits of foreign missions than this:

"I shall not attempt to measure the goodness or the power that is in the church, but let me indicate at least some of its effects that I myself have seen. I have spent one night in a drunken village and have heard the adults shout their filthy songs through the long night and have seen the little children being taught by their mothers to dance obscenely. And the next night I have camped before the door of a Christian's home in a Christian village, and when bedtime came and all was silent in the village as I was dropping to sleep I heard the father conduct worship with his family, catechizing them and praying with them.

"I have seen the beggarly shelter in which some poor old widows were housed in the rainy season, open to rain and cold, comfortless and filthy. They had no power to erect a decent hut, and their heathen friends had no use for them. And I have seen the Christian boys spending days, while they were still busy with their own houses, building a goodly dwelling for some poor widow.

"I have seen the body of a little baby lying in a stream, thrown away by its own mother because its upper teeth had appeared before its lower, and I have seen the tender care of a Christian mother for her weakly twins and deformed children, whom she had accepted as a gift from God, worthy all her maternal love.

"I have seen the terror of approaching death in the heathen's eyes and heard his wild charges of witchcraft against those he hated and on whom he would revenge himself on his deathbed. And I have seen, too, the triumphant passing of the Christian, who with prayer and song and exhortation to holiness said a loving farewell to his friends before going to meet the Great Friend who had changed him.

"I know men and women whose lives were drunken, whose conversation was filthy and whose passions were demoniacal, changed to sober-living, clean-talking, kindly and compassionate people. These things which I know and see convince me at least that there is no such transforming power in the world as the revelation of the love of God in Christ."

Mexico Today, by George B. Winton. This is another of the Missionary Education Movement's textbooks, and it carries the customary marks of preparation for classwork. But the Missionary Education Movement is noted for the timeliness of its textbooks; the themes of any one year are aptly chosen in parallels with public interest. And naturally under that policy Mexico—poor, tormented Mexico—becomes this season's foreign subject. Many therefore will want this compact explanation of current conditions in our troubled neighbor country, and such readers will find satisfaction in the concise analysis of Mexico's political tangles. Beginning with the conquest of Cortez, Dr. Winton traces hastily the course of government down to the rebellion of Madero, and then expands his treatment into details which luminously show reasons for Madero's own downfall and Huerta's precarious position. The religious, social, intellectual and moral analyses that follow are not less interesting or less informatory. Dr. Winton, who is editorial secretary of the Board of Foreign Missions of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, has long had special interest in the work which his church sustains across the Rio Grande and his knowledge of Mexico is, as repeated allusions in his pages show, very largely drawn from immediate personal observation. [Presbyterian Department Missionary Education, 156 5th avenue, New York City.

Immigrant Forces, by William P. Shriver. This is the book which the Missionary Education Movement recommends to classes that wish to study home mission problems this winter. As with all the textbooks of the movement, this volume is arranged in chapters which can be studied and discussed as eight successive weekly lessons. The author is the enthusiastic and inspiring young superintendent of the Presbyterian Home Board's immigration department, who has risen so rapidly in the last few years to leadership in Protestant ministry to the foreign-speaking peoples of the nation. And into this book he has written evident tokens of the spirit and power which account for that leadership — the power of seeing clearly and calmly at one and the same time both the peril and the promise involved in this tremendous increment of alien population in the United States; the spirit, along with that, which is unaffectedly ready to account the strangest and most remote of men as brethren for the sake of Christ. If both this spirit and this power can pass through these pages to all who study them in class or read them for individual information, the gain of the churches through Mr. Shriver's preparation of the work will be vast and lasting. And beyond its stimulus the book has immense informational value from the mass of facts which Mr. Shriver has condensed into it. [Presbyterian Department of Missionary Education, 156 5th avenue, New York City. 50 cents.

what's a small boy like you doing all alone at home Christmas morning?"

Hughie told his story. Just as he finished the big clock struck once. "Eleven thirty!" he cried in dismay. "I've only got fifteen minutes to catch the train. I just can't miss this one."

"Out of the house, everybody!" roared the chief. "Get your coat and hat, sonny, and you can ride to the station on the engine."

Hughie just caught his train, and when he pulled into Benton the first thing he saw was the big sleigh full of young cousins, and grandpa waiting on the platform. And there was grandma standing at the door in her white apron, just as he had pictured her, and everybody said "Merry Christmas!" all over again.

Of course Mrs. Morrison discovered that Hughie had a dirty face, left by the tears and smoke. Mothers never overlook anything. The story of the fire all came out bit by bit. Everyone oh-ed! and ah-ed! and exclaimed, and mother kissed the streaked face and called Hughie her hero. But it was father who did the best thing of all. He shook hands with Hughie, just as if he had been a man. "I am very proud of your presence of mind, my son," was all he said, but it sent such a troublesome lump into Hughie's throat that he was very glad when the big bell called them all to dinner.

Hughie was given the place of honor at grandpa's right, and everybody looked at him and smiled and he grew very red and uncomfortable indeed. But grandpa, who knew how boys felt about such things, came to the rescue.

"What's the time by that new watch, Hughie?" he cried. "I want to see just how long it takes to eat one of your grandmother's famous dinners."

His watch! Hughie's face grew redder still—it fairly flamed. He cast an appealing look at his grandfather, but there was no help there. Everyone was smiling and expectant as Hughie glanced around the table. He drew a long breath, went down into his pocket and brought up a collection of tiny screws and wheels and springs, and the case of his new watch, and laid them down on the snowy tablecloth without a word.

There was a dead silence for a moment, while everyone peered at the dismantled watch. Then, "Oh, Hughie, your Christmas watch!" cried his mother. "So that's what you were doing when I called you to go to Auntie Brewster's. And that's why you missed the train! Are you never going to stop taking things apart to see how they're made?"

But there was only pride in Mr. Morrison's face as he smiled at his small son.

"We mustn't forget, mother," he said, "that if Hughie had not missed the train we should have no home to return to tonight. That watch is worth $10,000 this minute, just as it is; and when Hughie is old enough he shall go to a school where they teach all about how things are made, and learn to be a great scientist——"

"Three cheers for Professor Hughie Morrison!" broke in grandpa, flourishing the carving knife in one hand and a drumstick in the other.

As for Hughie, he could only blush again and stare hard at the table; but privately he knew he should prefer to be a fireman.

Who Are the Men Who Favor License?

BY JAMES ELMER RUSSELL

This significant little article is apropos of the third consecutive victory for the temperance (no license) forces in Penn Yan. Penn Yan is the county seat of the only dry county in New York state, but it furnishes substantial argument for an extension of dry territory.

For four years Yates county has been the only "dry" county in the state of New York, with Penn Yan as its county seat. According to the New York state law, the whisky men in order to secure a resubmission of the question at the ballot box last November had to present to the town clerk of the town of Milo, in which Penn Yan is located a petition signed by 10 per cent of the voters. There were 224 signatures in all and a careful study of the names which Penn Yan is located, a petition signed by gives a striking illustration of the kind of men who favor license.

There were on the whisky petition: One out of the seven clothing and men's furnishing stores; three of the eleven grocery stores; three of the nine barbers; one of the four liveries; three of the five meat markets, and one of the three harness shops. There were

None of the four dry goods stores.

None of the five shoe stores.

None of the three hardware stores.

None of the three fair stores and light dry goods stores.

None of the three jewelry stores.

None of the two furniture stores.

None of the three confectioners.

None of the four coal dealers.

None of the five fire and accident insurance offices.

None of the two laundries.

None of the two florists.

None of the six dentists.

None of the three newspapers.

None of the fourteen lawyers.

None of the fourteen physicians.

None of the five clergymen.

None of the bank presidents, vice presidents, cashiers or assistant cashiers.

Only one of all the large manufacturing industries (wine cellars excepted).

None of all the elective officials of Yates county.

Furthermore, 140 of the signers of this whisky petition are not taxpayers, their names do not appear on the assessment roll, while all the other signers put together were assessed for only a comparatively small sum. If the claims of license advocates that "no license kills a town" were true isn't it strange that so few of the Penn Yan men who are really doing things advocated a return to license by signing the petition which the liquor men circulated?

As a matter of fact 250 of the leading citizens and business men signed their names to this statement pointing out the improvements which have come during Penn Yan's period of no license: "We are in favor of no license in Milo because we are convinced that during the present term of no license the social and moral conditions have materially improved, numerous homes have been made far more comfortable and happy and the children of these homes better fed and clothed, and the legitimate interests of Penn Yan have been substantially benefited as a result of no license."

With the inferior type of men in favor of license and the strong type in favor of no license it is really not a matter of surprise that upon election day, Nov. 4, Penn Yan went dry again by a larger majority than ever.

The Open Hearth

Sectionalism Separates U. S. and U. S. A.

There was much of truth in the recent editorial in The Continent, "Only the Church Hasn't Reached Gettysburg." Though sincere Christians, North and South, may give other reasons for continued disunion, yet when the matter is brought to the last analysis, sectionalism is found to be, as we say in the South, "the negro in the woodpile."

I would dissent from the position of your correspondent who in the issue of Oct. 16 states that the two churches, U. S. A. and U. S., have for fifty years developed along different lines. The U. S. A. Church, in its Declaratory Statement with reference to chapter 3 and chapter 10, section 3, of the Confession of Faith, has stated the universal belief of the church in amplifying the older statement of the confession that none of its language is to be understood in any such way as to make God the author of sin or interfere with the freedom of the creature. The U. S. Church took the same step when it adopted in its Assembly at Atlanta by an overwhelming vote the "Brief Statement of Belief." The Cumberland Church simply joined the U. S. A. and U. S. Churches on this common platform, exclaiming with Abraham, "Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?"

As to the licensure and ordination of men who are not in sympathy with the Confession of Faith and who doubt things fundamental —this condition exists only in a restricted section of the territory of the U. S. A. Church and is as much deplored by the great body of that church as by any member of the U. S. Church, however orthodox. No one can doubt this who was present in the U. S. A. Assembly at Atlanta and remembers how tense the atmosphere became when this question came up for discussion.

Born and reared in the South, educated at a southern university and a graduate of Princeton Seminary, I am in a position to speak for the orthodoxy of both wings of the church. Speaking for myself, I would say that I felt no jar or quiver when I crossed the line into the U. S. A. Church nor in returning again to the U. S. fold when I determined to labor in the South. Aside from sectional prejudice, as a U. S. A. brother stated from my pulpit not long ago, the difference between the great rank and file of both churches is a difference of one letter only. The Spirit of Christ is moving in the churches for cooperation and union in answer to his great prayer that we might be one, as he and his Father are one. God speed the glad day of reunion, the day when we shall love each other more because we know each other better. F. Z. BROWNE.

The Automobile as a Sunday Factor

The charge has been made more than once that the use on Sunday by owners of automobiles for simply recreation, amusement or the exhilarating experience of speeding over the boulevards and country roads is largely responsible for the decadence of Sunday church going. Just how far this is true it would be difficult to say; it is true, no doubt, to a certain extent. But there is a way to prove that the automobile on Sunday is a decided blessing and a practical aid to church-going.

There are hundreds of people in every community who would be glad to attend divine service on Sunday if they could get to church who are now debarred from that privilege. There are invalids, cripples and aged people who would rejoice in the privilege of joining their more fortunate fellow beings in the worship of God. Here is an opportunity for refuting the charge that automobiling on Sunday is demoralizing and hurtful to the morals of a

The Bicycle Bishop of Mackenzie County

The parish of the good Bishop touches the Canadian border and covers 3200 square miles. The Bishop has ten regular preaching stations which he reaches upon his trustworthy bicycle. He lives in a crude little cabin. His salary is $900 a year.

A few years ago this Presbyterian Bishop was an honor man in his theological class. He won a fellowship which gave him two years abroad. One of them he spent in Norway acquiring a knowledge of the Norwegian language, in which he has a vocabulary of over 5000 words. He preaches regularly in English, German and Norwegian. He is a Hero of the Cross.

A few years hence, at the most, the rigor of the climate and the exactions of his pioneering labors will bring him to the day of his disability.

Will the Presbyterian Church permit the Bicycle Bishop and others like him to come to want, in the day of old age and disability?

church-going community,—the splendid, generous and considerate act of giving pleasure in the right direction. If every owner of a car would select some unfortunate to be the recipient of his hospitality on a stated Sunday to be conveyed to the church of his choice and taken home again after the service, it stands to reason that it would be an act of the highest Christian service and appreciated to the limit of human gratitude. Perhaps this has been tried and found as satisfactory as suggested, but if the plan could be put into general custom what a delight it would be to the one who is detained at home by illness, lameness or by the too great distance to be traveled.

Let them who have not looked at the possibility of doing so much good and giving such pleasure by the use of their automobiles give this an earnest consideration. It seems to be eminently worthy of "trying out." J. M. B.

That Eulogy of Busch, the Brewer

I have not been a reader of The Continent so long as I have of the proceedings of Congress, but I read The Interior and The Continent thirty-three years and it has helped me much every way. I was never more surprised and hurt than when I read that the privilege of the house of representatives has been so prostituted as to permit the eulogy of a man—Adolphus Busch, the St. Louis brewer—whose business has been condemned by a majority of the people of this country—yea, the whole world is fighting the whisky and beer business. It shows to what underhand measures unscrupulous men will go to give a semblance of respectability to a cause denounced by courts, churches, business and all who are for the uplift, betterment and advancement of the people.

Now, as to the philanthropy and donations in the case of Adolphus Busch, compared with his wealth they are but a modicum. Take all his millions, multiplied a million times, how far would they go in covering the loss of life, the suffering of widows and orphans, the costs in criminal cases, the support of prisons and all other miseries caused by the liquor traffic to which he consecrated his life? Personally, Mr. Busch was much liked by many friends, and had his abilities been directed in channels calculated to really help his fellow man, the results would have been different.

Coincident with Representative Dyer's leave to print the Busch eulogy was Representative Hobson's proposed constitutional amendment to prohibit the manufacture and sale of alcohol in the United States. Two very significant proceedings. JERE WATSON TALLMAN.

What Is Premillenarianism?

In the leading editorial in The Continent of Oct. 23 there are two or three sentences which make one wonder what many intelligent Christian people really believe in regard to premillenarians.

"This particular sort of doubt," we are told, "is not to be confounded with that reversed and negative faith resulting from extreme predestinarian and premillenarian ideas—the dark doctrine that God never did intend to save more than a small fraction of mankind, and now purposes speedily to end the world as an outworn failure.

"Such was not the point of view of the minister here quoted. Neither is there enough of that sort of thinking to give color to the present-day church anywhere. What we are here confronting is something much more pervasive—and very much more startling.

"This far bigger pessimism is not doubting that God wishes to purify the world, but doubting whether he is able."

In answer to all this it should be said, first, that premillenarians do not believe "the dark doctrine that God never did intend to save more than a small fraction of mankind." Contrariwise they look upon all past ingatherings of souls, from the days of Abel until now, and even until the return of the Lord, in the glory of the Father with the holy angels, as simply "a kind of firstfruits" (James 1:18) of that wonderful spiritual harvest which will begin to be gathered in when Satan and all "the principalities, the powers, the world rulers of this darkness, the spiritual hosts of wickedness in the heavenly places" (Eph. 6:12, R. V.), shall have been cast out, and when "all Israel shall be saved" (Rom. 11:26), and when "the receiving of them" shall "be life from the dead" to the rest of mankind (verse 15).

In the second place, premillenarians of all men utterly repudiate this wholly unscriptural talk about the end of the world. This world will not be put an end to "as an outworn failure," for the earth abideth forever, and here, where the Son of God was once given over for a brief hour to the powers of darkness, he will yet establish his glorious reign as King of kings and Lord of Lords.

He shall nail forever that lie of the devil that the gospel is a failure, when once the whole church clearly understands that the world will not be converted during the present dispensation—what indeed neither Christ nor his apostles ever foretold.

Favors a Moderate Ritual

I have read in The Continent of Nov. 6 the article on observance by the pastors of so many "special Sundays." A subject that has for a long time been of great interest to me is, Should not we Protestants lay greater stress on many stages in the life on earth of our Lord?

My heart has been almost broken by the entrance of the Catholic Church into my family, and instead of becoming reconciled as the years pass I grieve over it more and more. But I am given also a better view of the shortcomings of my own loved church, one of which you handled to fine advantage in your editorial, namely, lack of reverence not only for the name of God but for his house and his worship.

I do wish a moderate ritual could be instituted, and now while the churches all seem to feel the need of it, and to be reaching out for better service, I am so glad you are giving the subject attention and want to thank you for it. MRS. MARY S. COTTON.

Says the Daily Press Is Not Free

Wanted—A daily free press!

We had such, but it is lost. We have a daily press, but it is not free. It seems to be subsidized by a foreigner—the subsidy to be paid in votes with an iron collar attachment. Yes, wanted—a daily free press devoted to our free institutions and government not supported by a foreign potentate but by the American people.

Here is the opportunity of a generation for patriotic Americans to rush to the rescue and supply this deep-felt want.

Wanted—A daily free press!

"Opportunities for Presbyterians"

In reply to J. A. P.'s recent request in The Continent: This is a village of 1,000 inhabitants. We have only one laundry and its owners wish to sell out. They have some machinery. Anyone who can do good work would have all he could do. A thousand dollars or less would buy it. We also need a man to run a meat market. MRS. C. E. PRATT.

Prayer-Topic Duplex Envelopes

At the conference of leaders immediately following the Men's National Missionary Congress at Chicago, in 1910, prominent place was given to the discussion of ways and means of deepening the prayer life. It was felt that in addition to the benefit derived from united prayer, there would be a distinct advantage in having this united prayer associated with the weekly offering. A committee was therefore appointed to inquire into the practicability of having a carefully selected list of prayer topics printed upon the back of the Duplex Envelopes.

We gladly agreed to co-operate with the Laymen's Movement by printing the topics. This excerpt from "Men and Missions," September, 1910, explains itself:

"The Duplex Envelope Company makes no charge for this extra printing, though it involves a large amount of additional labor. The Laymen's Missionary Movement has, of course, absolutely no financial interest in this company, but regards it as worthy of all confidence and appreciation for the splendid work it is doing toward better business methods in church and missionary finance."

The number of churches requesting the Prayer-Topic Envelopes is very gratifying, and it grows larger each year.

THE FIELD OF CHRISTIAN EFFORT

OBSERVES A DOUBLE ANNIVERSARY

Glenmore Organization Is Sixteen Years Old—Doctors Brown and Mott Call on Queen — Help Others at Christmas.

NEW YORK—Glenmore Avenue church, Brooklyn, observed a double anniversary last Sunday when it celebrated the sixteenth birthday of the organization of the church and the sixth anniversary of the coming of its pastor, Rev. Carl Podin. The congregation was organized with twenty-one members, of whom seven are still living. With the help of Dr. J. F. Carson of Central church and Frank G. Wilde, an elder in Classon Avenue church, and other members of presbytery the property is entirely free of debt. The week preceding the anniversary Sabbath was given up to special services. An interesting event in the first night's service was the conversion of a young Jewess, who rose toward the close and announced that she had been convinced by the sermon that Christianity was the true religion. The C. E. society was conducting the service and the preacher was Rev. Linn B. Armstrong of Richmond Hill church. Speakers at other meetings were Dr. John Dean, Rev. W. I. Davenport and John C. Doxsee, the deep sea fisherman of Islip, L. I. Rev. W. B. Gates of Wells Memorial church preached the anniversary sermon.

Call on Queen—At the conclusion of the meeting of the World's Missionary Conference in The Hague recently Dr. John R. Mott of New York, the chairman, Dr. Arthur J. Brown and other members of the committee called on Queen Wilhelmina at the royal castle. They were entertained at luncheon, after which Dr. Mott explained the work of the committee.

New Departure in Parish Papers—West End, Riverdale and John Hall Memorial churches are now supplied with parish papers on the plan of the Fleming H. Revell Company. Twenty-four pages of the magazine are taken up with articles and illustrations from the Revell publications and the highest type of religious literature. Four to eight pages carry news of the congregation and comments of the pastor. Canandaigua and Cooperstown are adopting the same plan.

Covenant School to Provide Christmas — The Bible school of the Church of the Covenant, which celebrated its twentieth anniversary recently, is planning to devote its Christmas offering in providing gifts for one of the Sunday schools in the American parish under the care of Rev. Norman M. Thomas.

To Have Annual Luncheon—The Presbyterian Ministers' Association is prospering under the administration of its new president, Rev. Oliver P. Barnhill of Stapleton. Dec. 15 the annual luncheon will be held at the Hotel Savoy.

Women Will Fight Mormonism—The Interdenominational Council for Patriotic Service held a meeting in the headquarters of the Reformed Church last week to consider more vigorous measures in its crusade again Mormonism. Addresses were made by ex-Senator Cannon of Utah and by Anthony Comstock.

McAuley Mission Celebrates Anniversary — The forty-first anniversary of McAuley Water Street mission was celebrated Sunday. At the afternoon service District Attorney Charles S. Whitman, Dr. Karl Reiland and Bishop Charles S. Burch took part. In the evening Dr. Arthur J. Smith and Fleming H. Revell were the speakers.

Brief Items—The C. E. society of Irving Square church, Brooklyn, Rev. Arthur Kurtz pastor, observed the first anniversary of its reorganization Nov. 25 with a supper in the church.—The Daily Vacation Bible School held a three days' conference last week for workers from the large cities of this country and Canada. At the Tuesday afternoon meeting Dr. Robert E. Speer presided and Dr. John H. Jowett delivered an address.—The West Side Y. M. C. A. has started a "Get Your Friend" campaign to increase the membership to 6,500.—A "Santa Claus Association" has been formed to obtain all letters addressed to Santa Claus and as far as possible answer the requests of children. The secretary is John D. Gluck, 58 West 36th street.

Personal Notes—M. Linn Bruce, former lieutenant governor of New York state and lately an elder in Fourth church, Manhattan, was bereaved last week by the death of his aged father, former moderator of General Assembly in the U. P. Church and long the pastor of the U. P. congregation at Delhi, N. Y.—The assistant pastor of Fifth Avenue church, Rev. Chauncey W. Goodrich, has resigned to become pastor of the First Congregational church, Brunswick, Me.—Dr. Edgar Whitaker Work of Fourth church appeared in his pulpit last week for the first time since his illness last May and pronounced the benediction. He will take up the work of his pastorate very gradually. He has been in Clifton Springs, N. Y., for some weeks.

FIRST CHICAGO CHURCH 80 YEARS OLD

Anniversary Exercises Will Be Held Next Month—Dr. Stone Will Speak to Men—Presbytery Indorses Training School.

CHICAGO—A pageant showing the history of the church in this part of the country will be given in connection with the eightieth anniversary of the establishment of the first religious organization in Chicago at First church Jan. 4-11. The pageant has been written by Dr. W. C. Covert, pastor, and is to be given by 100 young people. The anniversary exercises will begin Jan. 4 with a historical sermon by the pastor and stories of pioneer life for the children at the Sunday school hour. Tuesday night there will be a dinner, with the older members of the church as guests. Wednesday, interdenominational night, will be observed by addresses by Doctors Davis of the Congregational, Shailer Mathews of the Baptist and McDowell of the M. E. Church. Jan. 11 will be observed by a homecoming communion with a sermon in the evening by Dr. C. B. McAfee, former pastor.

Dr. Stone Will Lead—Tentative arrangements have been made by Chicago brotherhood for a second series of luncheons for men to be given after the holidays. Dr. John Timothy Stone will lead a number of the meetings in discussing phases of the every-member canvass.

College Men Enlisted—Recent college graduates to the number of twenty-four have been enlisted in community work with churches, settlements and the United Charities through the efforts of the college alumni service commission of the Y. M. C. A. This body serves as a clearing house for the newly graduated young men and the opportunities for community work.

Lots for Pullman Church—Pullman church, which has been worshiping in a hall for a number of years, will soon have a place of worship of its own. Two lots in a prominent location have recently been purchased.

Many Greet Moderators—There were 160 at the meeting of the Social Union at LaSalle Hotel on a recent Friday. Moderators of the three Assemblies represented at Atlanta, Doctors Stone, Lyons and Russell, made addresses. Music was furnished by the quartet of Oak Park First church.

Brief Items—Dan Crawford recently spoke in Oak Park church and before the Chicago Sunday Evening Club, also at McCormick Seminary.—Dr. John N. Mills, late of Evanston, came from Washington to Chicago recently to speak before the students of McCormick and other seminaries on "Progress and Prospects of China."—A farewell luncheon in honor of Dr. W. BETTER POSITION

And Increased Salary as a Result of Eating Right Food

There is not only comfort in eating food that nourishes brain and body but sometimes it helps a lot in increasing one's salary.

A Kansas school teacher tells an interesting experience. She says:

"About two years ago I was extremely miserable from a nervousness that had been coming on for some time. Any sudden noise was actually painful to me and my nights were made miserable by horrible nightmare.

"I was losing flesh all the time and at last was obliged to give up the school I was teaching and go home.

"Mother put me to bed and sent for the doctor. I was so nervous the cotton sheets gave me a chill and they put me in woolens. The medicine I took did me no apparent good. Finally a neighbor suggested that Grape-Nuts might be good for me to eat. I had never heard of this food, but the name sounded good, so I decided to try it.

"I began to eat Grape-Nuts and soon found my reserve energy growing so that in a short time I was filling a better position and drawing a larger salary than I had ever done before.

"As I see little children playing around me and enter into their games I wonder if I am the same teacher of whom, two years ago, the children spoke of as 'ugly old thing.'

"Grape-Nuts food with cream has become a regular part of my diet, and I have not been sick a day in the past two years." Name given by Postum Company, Battle Creek, Mich. Read "The Road to Wellville," in packages. "There's a Reason."

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true and full of human interest.

Philadelphia Presbytery Devotes Session to Important Subject—Bible School May Be Formed as Result of Meetings.

PHILADELPHIA—J. Addison Henry Memorial church entertained Philadelphia Presbytery at its November meeting. An hour was spent in conference and prayer in response to General Assembly's call and a popular meeting in the interest of evangelism was held in the evening under the leadership of Secretary George G. Mahy, D. D. The speakers were Messrs. Swain, Clark, Fulton, McDowell, Dunn, Boggs and Bell.

Laymen Lead Conference—In the interest of greater religious activity and effort throughout the bounds of presbytery from seventy to eighty ministers and prominent laymen of Philadelphia North held a conference on evangelism and the best methods of promoting it recently in Mount Airy church. The laymen presiding at the sessions and speaking on the subject were Cheesman A. Herrick, LL. D., W. H. Scott and S. Earle Hoover. Addresses were also made by Doctors W. B. Lower, George G. Mahy and John R. Davies and Rev. William H. Crothers, Rev. William McNally and Rev. S. A. Irwin.

Brief Items—The new Immanuel church, Dr. Edward S. Bowman pastor, will be dedicated Dec. 28. —An illustrated lecture on astronomy by Professor Doolittle of the University of Pennsylvania will be given at the ministers' meeting Dec. 15.—As a result of the recent Bible conference in this city a movement has been organized to establish a Bible school with Rev. I. C. Scofield as its head. Of the $30,000 needed $3,600 has been pledged.—Preliminary arrangements for a six-day Bible conference under other auspices the last week in March have recently been made. The following will be among the teachers: W. J. Bryan, Dr. J. H. Jowett, Dr. Biederwolf and Rev. Campbell Morgan.

Personal News Notes—The announced intention of Dr. Robert Hunter, stated clerk, and Dr. W. P. Fulton, permanent clerk, of Philadelphia Presbytery, to resign their offices in January came as a great surprise. They have each served for ten years. Pressure of other work is given as the reason.—The Board of Publication and Sunday School Work in response to the request of the Presbytery of New York has appointed Rev. Calvin W. Laufer, pastor of West Hoboken, N. J., church, representative for New York City.—Dr. John T. Reeve, pastor of Fourth church, has been appointed president of the Waldensian Society to succeed Dr. W. H. Oxtoby.—David R. Kerr, D. D., widely known through his previous educational work in the West, is a frequent attendant of ministerial gatherings in Philadelphia. He is now connected with "Beechwood," a school for young women at Jenkintown.

Old Pastor Dies—William E. Jones, D. D., one of the oldest members on the roll of Philadelphia Presbytery, died at his home in this city Dec. 2 aged 86. He was a native of England, a graduate of the University of Pennsylvania and Princeton Seminary. He served in the civil war and was pastor of a number of churches in New York, New Jersey and Pennsylvania. He acted a few years since for a time as chaplain of the Presbyterian hospital, Philadelphia.

Burns Mortgage—Puritan church in the Kensington district of the city, having succeeded in paying off a mortgage of $7,000, engaged in a mortgage burning service conducted by the pastor, Rev. James G. Raymond, and participated in by Doctors Fulton, Hill, Hunter, Dunn and Elder James A. Hayes and other trustees of presbytery.

Remember Dr. Johnson—A memorial service in memory of Dr. Herrick Johnson was held in First church Dec. 7 by former students of his in McCormick Seminary. Among those participating were Dr. E. Y. Hill, Rev. B. A. Konkle, Dr. R. E. L. Jarvis, Dr. D. S. Kennedy, Rev. J. W. Francis, Dr. J. W. Cochran, Dr. J. R. Sutherland, Rev. J. H. Dunham, Dr. S. W. Steckel.

SUNDAY SCHOOL WORKERS CONFER

There closed Dec. 4 at Waterloo, Iowa, the first of this season's series of conferences of the Sunday school missionaries of the Board of Publication and Sabbath School Work. The conference was entertained by Westminster church. Twenty-seven missionaries were present from states of the central West and North. Additional to these were the ten educational superintendents of the church. The conference continued for five days and was presided over by the secretary of the board, Alexander Henry, D. D. Other board representatives were Rev. E. Morris Fergusson, educational superintendent of Sabbath school missions, and John M. Somerndike, superintendent of Sunday school missions.

The themes discussed pertained to either the missionary or educational functions of the board's activities. Many of the missionaries and all the educational superintendents were assigned conferences or popular meeting subjects. The board's plans to fill out the outline of religious education and missionary duty laid upon it by the denomination were given expression in an address by Dr. Henry, "An Enlarging Field of Service." A series of luminous lectures were those of Mr. Fergusson on "The Modern Sunday School: Its Aim, Scope, Organization, Force and Curriculum."

The educational superintendents' section of the conference was the most satisfactory yet held.

DISCUSS MANY NEEDED REFORMS

The annual convention of the National Reform Association at Pittsburg last week attracted a large number of delegates. Almost every phase of social and national issues was discussed. In the session devoted to Mormonism several Mormon elders resented the charge that polygamy is still practiced in Utah, and remonstrated against a motion urging a federal amendment prohibiting polygamy. The convention disapproved the action of the Pittsburg school board in limiting the reading of the Bible in the schools to the book of Proverbs. A campaign was launched to raise $25,000 to aid in placing the Bible in every school in America. Henry C. Minton, D. D., of Trenton, N. J., was reelected president and Dr. James S. Martin of Pittsburg general superintendent.

TALK OF COLLEGE PROBLEMS

Presidents of twenty-five Presbyterian colleges, members of the College Union, meeting at McCormick Seminary, Chicago, Dec. 2, asked General Assembly to request synods to have contributions sent direct to the College Board for apportionment. Many of the presidents expressed themselves in favor of more progressive publicity methods. President W. H. Black of Missouri Valley College was elected president, Dr. John A. Marquis, Coe, vice president, and L. M. McAfee, Parsons, secretary.

EVERY CHILD WILL ENJOY
In Music Land
A Handbook for Young People
By GEORGE P. UPTON, author of "The Standard Operas," etc.
Frontispiece in color and 50 other pictures.
Price $1.25 net

In the form of fifteen "fireside" stories Mr. Upton tells what children should know about music. "A Famous Battle of the Fairies and the Elves" ingeniously explains the origin of "notes," and stories of the boyhood days of different composers are told in an intimate personal way that will delight boys and girls. No book like it since Donald G. Mitchell's "Old Story Tellers."

RESCUE MISSION SUNDAY OBSERVED

M. E. Trotter Speaks to Milwaukee Audience—Modern Financial Methods Presented to Churches of the State.

MILWAUKEE — The annual Rescue Mission Sunday was Nov. 23. A mass meeting in the afternoon at a downtown theater was addressed by M. E. Trotter of Grand Rapids, Mich, and by others. There were seven rallies in different churches in the evening with large audiences. The Milwaukee mission building is as fine as any in the country and under the leadership of U. V. Sillaway the mission is doing a splendid work.

Asks Court for Child—Rev. S. P. Todd, Berean church, has been in the courts trying to obtain custody of Mary Dolenz, aged 4. Her mother, who was a Presbyterian, before she died expressed a desire that he take charge of her. The stepfather, a Roman Catholic, aided by ecclesiastical authorities, is seeking to secure the girl.

Brief Items—Rev. C. A. Adams, one of the district superintendents of home missions in Wisconsin, conducted a week of special meetings at Hope church, beginning Nov. 2.—Under its new pastor, Rev. Sipko F. Rederus, Holland church is making good progress, the Sabbath school having shown a remarkable growth.—Dr. S. H. Murphy, pastor at Delafield, underwent a serious operation two weeks ago, and grave apprehensions for his recovery were felt.—At a special meeting Nov. 24 Morris Caldwell, a student at Carroll College, was taken under care of presbytery.

Presents Financial Plans—Rev. A. F. McGarrah of the executive commission occupied the pulpit of Westminster church on a recent Sunday morning and in the afternoon met representatives of the various churches in conference at Calvary church. He spent the month of November in Wisconsin, holding conferences on financial methods in different parts of the state.

Social Gatherings—Rev. H. C. Nott, pastor of German Reformed church, entertained the Wycliffe club Nov. 17. Vinton M. Pace, advertising manager for the department store of Gimbel Brothers and an elder in the Washington Park church, gave a talk on "Church Advertising." Rev. W. J. Buchanan, pastor of West Allis church and president of the club, has accepted an appointment as superintendent of home missions for the Synod of Illinois with headquarters at Monmouth.—Dr. Paul B. Jenkins, pastor of Immanuel church, spent ten days hunting in the woods of northern Wisconsin and as a result the Fisherman's club of his church were his guests at a venison dinner in a downtown hotel Dec. 2.

FOES FAIL IN INJUNCTION PROCEEDINGS

Sunday Tabernacle Going Up After Many Efforts to Prevent It—Ministers Awake to Vice of the City and Condemn Liquor Ads.

PITTSBURG—The city is busy getting ready for the Sunday evangelistic campaign. Prayer meetings are being held in nearly 1,500 sections. The downtown group of churches is holding noonday prayer meetings instead of in the evenings and in many sections union meetings on Wednesday evening. The last effort to prevent the building of the tabernacle was a request of the court to grant an injunction. The case was argued before Judge Frazer Dec. 3. The injunction was refused and the case dismissed. Immediately a large force of carpenters went to work and the foreman assures the committee that the building will be finished in time for the first choir rehearsals Dec. 16.

Condemn Liquor Ads—At a meeting of the Pittsburg Ministerial Union Monday, Dec. 1, in the Y. M. C. A. auditorium, the temperance committee, Rev. George Shelton chairman, outlined a campaign against the liquor interests of the county. A strong resolution was passed condemning the liquor advertisements which appear in the daily papers. The social service committee has secured a secretary and will establish headquarters in the downtown section of the city at once. Every effort will be made to inform the public as to conditions and to enlist the church membership through the pastors in the work of cleaning up the city.

Y. M. C. A. Leaders Speak—The Y. M. C. A. held an anniversary dinner at Schenley hotel Dec. 8. The principal speakers were Fred B. Smith and George W. Perkins of New York and Glen M. Fisher, national Y. M. C. A. secretary of Japan. Mr. Smith also addressed a meeting of men in the Grand opera house Sunday, Dec. 7.

Take Gospel to Masses—John Allison, D. D., pastor of Point Breeze church, has begun a series of Sunday evening meetings in the Sheraden theater, East Liberty district. The meetings are being conducted under the auspices of the congregation, which is located in a fashionable residence section and is anxious to take the gospel to the masses.—Dr. Frederic Poole gave his noted lecture on "Pekin and the Great Wall" in Ben Avon church Dec. 5.

Nelson's Topical Helps Bible

The only way to really know the Bible so as to intelligently teach or discuss it, is to take its leading topics, and study every reference in the Bible to that particular subject; then you will know it thoroughly.

This Topical Helps Bible, which is the only one of its kind published, gives complete references on nearly 300 leading topics. For instance, on the subject of Christ, there are 844 separate references, all properly classified; on Prayer and Prayers, there are 125 references; on Prophecy and Prophets, 213 references: on Faith, 62 references; on Promises, 105 references, etc.

In fact, on any topic that you may seek light, you will find all Biblical references to it in the alphabetically arranged index—answers to your questions, Promises for your comfort and Illustrations in the lives of Biblical characters, in the plain and understandable language of the American Standard Bible.

Just let us send you free, sample pages of the book and its references, so that you may see for yourself what a remarkable Bible it is.

KANSAS CITY WILL FORM NEW CHURCH

Residence Suburb Needs Organization—Cabinet of One Member from Each Society of Congregation Helps First Church.

KANSAS CITY—A new church at St. Claire Park, a residence suburb between Kansas City and Independence, is to be organized Dec. 14. The home mission committee of presbytery has made a careful canvass of the field. A vigorous organiza-will be formed. Rev. Frank Bascom is in charge of this work.

Churches Progress—Two Endeavor societies of Linwood church have been federated with a membership of 100 and an intermediate society organized with thirty members.—First church has a cabinet of thirty members organized for the general work of the church. Each society has one member. The men's club and the men's Bible class have been reorganized.—Benton Boulevard church has inaugurated a campaign of personal evangelism and membership which is enlisting more people than any recent undertaking in this church.

Sunday Schools Grow—Westport church has secured the services of Paul C. Payne, graduated last year from Park College, as pastor's assistant. He is reorganizing the music of the church. There is probably no church in the city with a Sunday school better organized and featured.—Immanuel church Sunday school has doubled in attendance since September. This church supports its own missionary in China. A vigorous campaign for an effective community service is being pushed.

Building Plans Soon—"The old Second" is now moving forward rapidly toward the realization of its hopes in going to its present location. The church has permanently located itself at the corner of 55th and Oak streets. Nov. 16 $73,000 was subscribed for a new building. A building committee is now studying the needs and possibilities of the parish and will report a plan at an early date.

DR. FOULKES TELLS OF BOARD'S WORK

Speaks at Cleveland Club Meeting—To Confer on Budget at Presbytery—Congregation Campaigns for 300 New Members.

CLEVELAND—Secretary W. H. Foulkes of the Board of Ministerial Relief and Sustentation, fresh from a successful financial campaign in Pittsburg, was guest and speaker at the December meeting of the Presbyterian Club. His address upon the cause he represents was inspiring.

Will Confer on Budget—Winter meeting of presbytery will be held in St. John's Beckwith Memorial church, Rev. E. Monnet pastor, an Italian church in what is termed "Little Italy." During the year improvements costing $10,000 have been added to the original church edifice. There is to be a budget conference conducted by Rev. A. F. McGarrah and also a foreign missionary conference, in which Rev. William P. Shriver will take an important part.

Dan Crawford Speaks—Dan Crawford, African missionary, recently paid this city a brief visit, delivering addresses in private homes, at Adelbert College and before a company of ministers and laymen at a lunch in the Chamber of Commerce. He expects to return in February to give a series of lectures at Adelbert College.

Publishes Sermons—In response to requests a number of sermons delivered in Old Stone church by Dr. A. B. Meldrum have been printed in pamphlet form. The front wall of the chapel of Old Stone church has been beautifully decorated and made especially helpful by having the ten commandments placed in gold letters upon the renovated surface.

Work for 300 Members—Westminster church, Dr. R. R. Bigger pastor, has entered upon a campaign for 300 new members. The workers' pledge is as follows: "I promise to do my best to secure one new member, by letter or renewal of membership, or on confession of faith, and after securing one, to help someone else do the same, believing God will help me if I do my best."

Goes to Buffalo—Rev. Robert J. McAlpine of Boulevard church will go to Central church, Buffalo, N. Y., the middle of this month.

URGE PASTORAL EVANGELISM

LOS ANGELES—The evangelistic department of the Board of Church Extension has issued a call to the session of the churches of Los Angeles Presbytery to formulate and carry into execution definite evangelistic programs for the winter months. The importance of pastoral evangelism is emphasized and the ministers of the presbytery are asked to offer their services for work of this kind beyond the bounds of their own parishes. Rev. E. F. Hollenbesk of San Diego is chairman.

Plan $125,000 Plant—Wilshire church has plans for one of the handsomest buildings in the West. There will be a main church building and a separate Sunday school and social service building, the whole to cost about $125,000. The buildings, which will be of Tudor Gothic design, will occupy the corner of Western avenue and 3rd street. Wilshire church is in one of the best residence sections of the city and is about one year old. Rev. Gilbert C. Patterson is organizer and pastor of the church.

Call Dr. Mason—The congregation of Calvary church, Long Beach, which was organized recently by the members of First church who supported Dr. Mason in the controversy which ended in his withdrawal from the pastorate of that church, have extended a call to Dr. Mason to become their pastor and he has accepted. The question of the recognition of Calvary church will come before Los Angeles Presbytery at its January meeting.

ELDERS CONFER ON EVANGELISTIC WORK

Instruction in Personal Work Is Being Given—Church Outgrows Present Building and Fund for New One Started.

ST. PAUL-MINNEAPOLIS—The evangelistic committee of the two presbyteries is alive to the needs and opportunities presenting themselves. In line with the suggestions of Dr. R. N. Adams to synod there are being held conferences concerning personal and church evangelism. Under the auspices of the Y. M. C. A. courses of instruction in personal work have been provided in various centers. The elders of the twin cities held a most important meeting on a recent Friday evening at the Minneapolis Bible Institute. The interchange of sessional visits is proving most stimulating. These various preparations will doubtless be followed by a simultaneous campaign for souls a little later in the season.

Needs New Building—The growing needs of Macalester church have made imperative a new house of worship. An option upon the old property has been given and a friend of the church has subscribed $5,000 to the building fund. Dr. James Wallace and the pastor, Dr. F. D. McRea, are the committee in charge.

Brief Items—The addresses recently delivered at the memorial services in Macalester College for the late Elder James Kirk, a trustee, have been printed. —Dr. H. C. Swearingen was host to the ministers' club Dec. 1. Papers were read by Rev. B. Scott Bates and Dr. Amos I. Dushaw.—Winona needs a goodly sum for the building of a Y. W. C. A., hence sent for the pastor of Central church, St. Paul, Dr. Harry Noble Wilson, to inaugurate the campaign.—Dr. John Robertson, supply of First church, St. Paul, has been elected to the chair of Old Testament exegesis, etc., at the Episcopal Theological Seminary at Faribault. He expects soon to be ordained in that denomination.

Speaks to Young People—Miss Abbie H. J. Upham, field secretary of the Woman's Board of Home Missions, last Sunday evening addressed a union of the young people of Lexington Parkway, Knox and Merriam Park churches at the last named place.

EXPECT TO COMMENCE WORK SOON

DETROIT—Bethany church is receiving contributions for the new church building at such an encouraging rate that the trustees have decided that when a few thousand dollars more are paid in the work shall be commenced. Only two Detroit Presbyterian churches are so favorably located for a substantial growth in the near future as is Bethany. Dr. J. T. Black is pastor.

Practical Work in Siam—The C. E. society of Grosse Pointe Evangelical church, which is Presbyterian in fact although not in name, is doing a fine work in Siam. The society gave a motor adjustable to low stages of water for use on boats to bring to the hospital patients living on the Petchaburi river. Thomas G. Sykes, D. D., is pastor of the church.

Prayer Meeting Is Growing—Memorial church, of which Rev. J. Marcus Skinner is pastor, has in spite of its unfavorable environment succeeded in financial advance and an increased attendance at both the prayer meeting and the young people's meeting. The Knights of the Holy Grail, an organization of the church, held a very successful banquet recently.

Brief Items — Dr. J. Frederick Fitschen addressed the Ministers' Association last Monday morning on "Church Architecture." It was a timely subject, as several Detroit churches are planning to build.—At the conference at Jefferson Avenue church for ministers and church officers Dec. 8 the speakers were President John S. Nollen of Lake Forest and Cleland B. McAfee, D. D., of McCormick Seminary.—Central church, Dr. Hugh Jack pastor, has solved the problem of the evening service by a personal canvass of the neighborhood.

William Bryant.

"Men at Work" Is Growing

According to the November issue of Men at Work, that organ of the Presbyterian Brotherhood has added 200 subscribers during the last six weeks. The paper has enlarged the space devoted to news of the activities of men in various churches. A number of churches are forming clubs of subscribers.

SCHOOL AND COLLEGE

Attend Inauguration — Delegates from a large mber of educational institutions were present the inauguration of Dr. George E. Fellows as esident of James Millikin University Dec. 9.

Help Many to Better Places—W. F. Bohn, secrey to President King of Oberlin College and dictor of the college bureau of appointments, has ued an interesting bulletin pointing out the way which that institution is assisting self-supporting dents to earn an education and members of the aduating classes to find desirable positions. The reau assisted eighty-two members of the gradung class last June to permanent positions. Thirty-six of the alumni were helped to better positions. The salaries received by these 118 persons aggregated $82,283; the amount of remuneration varied from the minimum represented by free tuition to $1,700.

Will Establish New Department—Fifty thousand dollars for establishing a department of economics and business was given recently to Whitman College by Hollon Parker of Portland, Ore., formerly a resident of Walla Walla.

Will Go to Kansas City—Four representatives of Hastings College have already registered for the international student volunteer convention at Kansas City during the holidays and several more are thinking seriously of attending.

Student Volunteers Meet—The eastern association of student volunteers recently met at Wilson College. Among the speakers at the conferences were President Anna J. McKeag, Wilson College, Dr. E. W. Capen, Dr. J. Ross Stevenson, Rev. W. H. Crothers, Dr. J. A. Blair and Dr. I. T. Headland.

Wooster Is Prospering—The University of Wooster is enjoying one of the best years in its history. The enrollment is as follows: Graduate students for the M. A. degree, 4; seniors, 60; juniors, 80; sophomores, 128; freshmen, 161. The spirit of the student body, it is declared, was never more wholesome and earnest.

Class in Mental Hygiene—Miss Fannie C. Gates of Chicago has become dean of women of Grinnell College and will conduct a class in mental and physical hygiene for women. Grinnell is one of the first colleges in the west to introduce such a course and if proved a success it will be enlarged next year. The board of trustees have founded a lectureship as a memorial for ex-President Gates. Professor Walter Rauschenbush will deliver the first series during the week of Feb. 22, 1914.

Would Get Elders Together

Following a suggestion he received through The Continent, Rev. W. R. Coventry, moderator of Aberdeen Presbytery, has suggested that the elders arrange an efficiency conference at a central church some time this winter. He has sent to the elders a suggested program for them to fill in the speakers. Laymen will have entire charge and discuss difficulties in their churches and the way they were solved.

There are in the Presbyterian Church 1,256,439 Sunday school pupils.

The Joy of Your Christmas

always greater, is it not, when you feel assured at the pleasures of the day are not to be followed y the necessity of extraordinary measures to meet our proper obligations? Have you ever thought out the many items of expense involved in the onduct of a religious educational institution? How e little items, day after day, add up and make big ms—and these must be met! This is true of ubuque Seminary, and if you have thought of iving us your practical assistance, what you do at is time, or promise now to do later, will help to ake our Christmas happier—and yours, too, we believe. Our institution is under the auspices of General Assembly, and its work in preparing foreign speaking young men for religious activity among their countrymen in America is well known to readers of The Continent. Below, for your interest, we are giving you a few of the items that enter into the total needs. To present a year's education to a student or ten of them, or otherwise to take a share in the work, is just the opposite of the thing that is being opposed by the "Society for the Prevention of Useless Giving" that you have been reading about.

$1 Will buy potatoes and salt for one meal for the entire student body. The young men peel them.

$3.35 Is the actual cost to us for each student for board, room, light, heat and rough dry laundry for seven days.

$6 Will purchase, even at present high prices, a day's supply of butter for all the students who live at the college.

$10 Light for all classrooms and dormitories, as well as electric power for the laundry, where all the school work is done, for three days costs only $10.

$20 Will pay board and lodging for six weeks for one young man or for six young men for the week between Christmas and New Year's.

$53.50 All the professors of the institution can be paid by you one day for this sum. A Christmas gift that gives you the memory of having maintained a whole college for an entire day is worth while.

$120 Is the cost to us for one student for the entire school year, including board and lodging.

ll information about the investment of a Christmas gift, of any size, will be given promptly if you will address the president, C. M. Steffens, D.D., ubuque, Iowa. We will be glad to have you inquire about our graduates who may be working in the city where you reside. Checks and money ders should be made payable to Dubuque German College and Seminary.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR ACTIVITIES

Missouri—Third church, Kansas City, has the banner young people's society in the city. It contains fifty young people who will lead or participate in a public service.

Minnesota—The society of Central church, St. Paul, Dr. Harry Noble Wilson pastor, distributed sixty baskets of dinner to poor families the evening before Thanksgiving. This is an annual service in which the society joins heartily.

Michigan—Rev. S. V. Reagan, pastor of Grace church, Saginaw, gave a lecture on efficiency recently before the Flint C. E. union. He told of the society in Grace church which in three years had grown from twenty-one to ninety members. The society recently raised $3,000 to install a gymnasium in the church.

Illinois—Sixty young people recently attended the annual banquet of the society of First church, Champaign. Rev. Martin E. Anderson told of the important part this society had had in the formation of the new organization in connection with McKinley Memorial church.

New Jersey — The missionary rally of Union county Christian Endeavorers will be held in Westfield church Dec. 12. Rev. Frank Higgins will be the speaker. The Endeavor society of First church, Elizabeth, will give a sketch in costume of "The Landing of the Immigrants."

North Carolina—A committee of six ministers and laymen has been appointed to form a C. E. union of Charlotte and Mecklenburg counties. It is hoped that a society may be formed in every Presbyterian and Reformed Presbyterian church in the county. The committee was appointed after an address by Dr. A. D. McClure of Wilmington, president of the C. E. for this state.

MANY COME FROM FOREIGN LANDS

Students from many foreign countries are numbered among the attendants at many of the smaller colleges of the country. Some of the middle West colleges have a considerable representation of Japanese and Koreans. The Coe College students shown in the picture have formed a Cosmopolitan club. Austria, Persia, Turkey, England, Canada and the Philippines are represented by these young men.

HANOVER COLLEGE HELPS COMMUNITY

Hanover College is undertaking to contribute to the rural life problem in a practical way. The department of social science has made a number of surveys of religious, moral, educational, social and economic conditions prevailing in the contiguous territory. The department of athletics has promoted a league of athletic organizations which will gather in a large proportion of the young men of the towns and villages of the county in which the college is located. Members of the faculty go to lecture and preach and to promote better Sabbath school organization. One of the best lines of work is undertaken by a voluntary organization of students known as "The Fishermen's Club," the members of which come from all college classes and are pledged to do definite Christian work, both in the college and in the needy fields of the vicinity. Radiating from Hanover they go in teams of three and four men on Sunday to carry the Christian training of the college to the country districts. They have opened a clubroom for use of those students whose rooming places do not afford opportunities for satisfying their social impulses. The club also conducts weekly devotional exercises in the township consolidated school.

THE BLOOMFIELD THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY LAYS CORNERSTONE OF KNOX HALL

Impressive Ceremonies and Inspiring Addresses Marked the Occasion

The cornerstone of Knox Hall, which is being erected as a memorial to the late Rev. Dr. Charles E. Knox, first president of the Bloomfield Theological Seminary, was laid with imposing exercises in the presence of a large assemblage of visiting clergymen and laymen.

In connection with the ceremony the usual opening exercises were first held in the Westminster Presbyterian Church. The clergy, board of directors, faculty, and students marched to the edifice, led by Rev. Dr. David R. Frazer, president of the Board of Directors, and Rev. Dr. Stanley White, secretary of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions. The wearing of cap and gown added to the attractiveness of the procession.

Dr. White gave a splendid address on the Joys of the Christian Ministry, from which we quote:

"After a happy pastorate of many years," said Dr. White, "I am of the opinion there is nothing in the world which a man can take up that is so full of satisfactory joy and delight as the ministry of the Gospel.

"There is the joy of the challenge, the joy of achievement and the joy of yielding."

Following the exercises the procession returned to the new hall for the laying of the cornerstone, which was done by Dr. Frazer.

Dr. A. W. Fismer, who had charge of the new building fund, was the speaker at these exercises. He said that eighteen years ago Dr. Knox had made a most remarkable prophecy.

"At that time Dr. Knox published an urgent appeal in which he said:

" 'We should have another building at once. Students from other nations will increase in number as we make provision for them. An Italian house and an Italian instructor would attract a houseful of Italian students. A Bohemian house and a Bohemian instructor would attract a houseful of Bohemian students. We can now greatly enlarge our power among the foreign people. Soon these foreign people will come again across the seas in great numbers. At the hour when our national prosperity returns, the tide will flood. Will not Christian men and women give us the needed building and appliances? Here is a fine opportunity for a memorial.'

"This pathetic appeal proved to be a prophecy indeed and it is now being fulfilled in every particular. Our national prosperity has returned, the flood tide of immigration has come. We have a houseful of Italian, Hungarian, Ruthenian and other students, under able instructors of their own nationality—and the house is in sight. The 'fine opportunity for a memorial' is at hand, and it is to be known as Knox Hall, in loving remembrance and grateful recognition of the faithful services of the first President, who, for thirty years, had borne the burden of Bloomfield Seminary on his great, good heart.

"This Institution, with its enlarged equipment, occupies a most strategic place in the home foreign field. Within a radius of thirty miles from this point, the population is forty-three per cent foreign, a total of three million. New Jersey is fifty-two per cent foreign, and Bloomfield Seminary is the only institution in this great mission field prepared to give to candidates of several nationalities a fair collegiate and theological education in the use of their mother tongue. We are confidently hopeful the new building will mean a new era of expanding growth and usefulness. Every student sent forth means a new center of influence for good.

"God grant, that its healthful, fruitful growth may be in proportion to its larger mission in the Master's Kingdom."

church of the place, has resumed work under its own minister, Rev. S. S. Heighen.

Minister Works on Farm—The church of Philip is distinguished as being the only self-supporting church in Reserve Presbytery and that despite year after year of crop failure in the region all about it, a newly settled region in the western part of synod. Rev. O. E. Tell is their minister and they pay his salary largely in trade, while he works his own farm.

HAS NEW MISSION SUPERINTENDENT

OHIO—Rev. Robert E. Pugh has been released from Canfield church to take the position of synodical superintendent of home missions with headquarters at Columbus, succeeding Rev. W. H. Houston.

Celebrates Anniversary — Rev. W. P. Hollister, pastor of First church, East Palestine, celebrated the eleventh anniversary of his pastorate there with special services Nov. 30. This church recently remodeled its buildings, allowing for a seating capacity of 1,200. The membership has more than doubled during the present pastorate.

Indorses China Team—The ministerial union of Zanesville, Ohio, by unanimous vote recently indorsed the work of the united missionary campagn team which held a convention in this city Nov. 23 and 24. Doctors Corey, Wiley and Bastel composed the team.

ORGANIZE MEN OF CHURCH

MICHIGAN—A men's class has been organized at Lapeer church following a visit of Rev. A. R. Atwood. The pastor, Rev. S. G. Livingston, has been asked to consider a call to a church in New York state. He has been at Lapeer nearly eight years. — The missionary pledges in Deckerville church, under the budget plan carried out by a simultaneous every-member canvass, have amounted to about four times the best previous year. Over 90 per cent of the membership responded with subscriptions.

RALLY TEMPERANCE FORCES

ILLINOIS—A rally of the temperance forces of Moline and Rock Island was recently held at Augustana College to launch a campaign in the two cities to obtain local option.

Brief Items—The first Illinois state conference for older boys was held in Peoria Nov. 28 to 30 at the new Y. M. C. A.—Aurora expects to have a go-to-church Sunday Dec. 21.—The corner stone of the new church at Watseka was laid Nov. 23 by the pastor, Rev. H. G. Gleiser, assisted by the three Protestant ministers of the city. The church expects to be under roof by January.—Warren church is now supplied by a student from McCormick Seminary.

THE MAN BEHIND THE DEED

Holding of public office forces upon many men a personal publicity that is not agreeable. When a man is elected to serve the people he becomes in a way the property of the public, and the public has a right to know what he does and what he thinks. To a somewhat similar degree the minister is a public person. The personality of the pastor must frequently be made prominent. Absence of desire to see one's name in print should not prevent doing good by letting others have the ideas worked out in one's church. The man behind the deed can be subordinated, but the work itself should be revealed for the sake of the stimulus to others. Tell The Continent about it.

WHAT THE MEN ARE DOING

Wisconsin—A brotherhood was recently formed at First church, Oshkosh, at a dinner at which Rev. N. B. Barr of Chicago spoke.

Michigan—A quarterly service held on a Sunday evening by the brotherhood of Coldwater church attracts a full house. At the latest meeting, Nov. 30, the local band assisted with the music. The men do everything connected with these services.

New Jersey—Third church, Trenton, brotherhood recently held its annual dinner at which Col. Frederick I. McNeely presided. The speakers were Frederick A. Wallis, president of the men's brotherhood of New York, and Secretary Robert E. Speer of the Foreign Mission Board.

Closes Fifty Ohio Saloons

The recent election at Steubenville, Ohio, resulted in a victory for the "dry" forces, closing fifty saloons. This was the first election under the state's new option law.

Financial Situation

First of Year May See Turn for Better, Say Observers—Big Business Concerns Owned by Multitude of Stockholders.

As the first of the year approaches, the feeling among bankers and investment houses grows stronger that there will be a turn in conditions at that time. There have been a number of inquiries from prospective investors concerning places to put their money Jan. 1 and it is confidently expected that there will be a stronger influence felt soon. Most lines of business have been affected by the feeling of uncertainty which has spread over the country, although there is no definite influence which can be charged with the apparent lack of confidence in the future. James J. Hill was quoted in Chicago the other day to the effect that business in the Northwest was good and that earnings of the Great Northern were holding up well. It is generally conceded that railway earnings constitute a fair index of the condition and trend of business of the country, although they are not so quickly responsive to conditions as are reports from wholesalers.

Who Owns the Trusts?—The Wall Street Journal recently collected figures printed in a number of recent articles concerning the ownership of the big business concerns of the country and finds that there are 929,282 shareholders of 191 corporations, including 46 railroads and 145 industrials. There are in the country also 9,000 public utility concerns, to say nothing of over 25,000 banking institutions. The conclusion is obvious that the ownership of the business of the country has passed from the hands of a comparative few into the hands of the many, even though there are a few men who do control a considerable portion of the available cash capital at any one time.

One Income Tax Trouble Banished—According to a recent ruling the treasury officials will not exercise the latent power in the income tax law to compel reports on incomes from everyone regardless of the possibility of their owing anything under the tax. Returns will be required only from those persons who are taxable. The machinery of the government will be used to find the people who should pay and don't come forward. The tax is creating a great deal of disturbance in banking circles owing to the confusion incident to application of the new ruling and charges on coupons offered, and worries of anxious customers. A Pennsylvania congressman has prepared a bill adding a supertax of 5 per cent on incomes over $20,000 to pay for the cost of the naval equipment of the country. Bankers are looking at such "evidences of extortion" with suspicion.

A College Professor Is Thankful—"Please accept my heartfelt thanks for your kind letter of Nov. 25. I shall follow the advice there given and I am sure to my advantage. One in my position in life feels so helpless in such matters from small experience that advice is doubly appreciated."

"My Best Investment"—Replies are coming to The Continent in response to the offer of $5 for a letter telling about successful investments. See the announcement again this week. Letters should reach the editor by Dec. 18.

Brief Bits of Business News—The last sale of seats on the New York Stock Exchange was for $40,000, greatly under prices of a few years ago.—The average deposit in the postal savings banks of the country is $102, and the total deposits are $33,818,870, practically all of which is money which would not have gone to savings banks if the postal banks had not been started.

MINISTERIAL OBITUARY

Rev. Thomas W. McDavid died Nov. 23 at Coffeen, Ill., after a brief illness. He was ordained by Vandalia Presbytery of the Cumberland Church in 1867. He held pastorates at Pleasant Prairie, Maple Grove, Mount Tabor, Irving and other Illinois towns.

Rev. W. W. Thorpe died Nov. 17 at Lestershire, N. Y., and was buried at Binghamton, N. Y. Mr. Thorpe was born in 1833 and was a graduate of Hamilton College and Auburn Seminary. He was a chaplain during the civil war and an intimate friend of Dr. Theodore L. Cuyler.

Dr. Hugh Spencer Williams, former pastor of Court Street church, Memphis, Tenn., died in that city Dec. 3. Dr. Williams was born in Wales in 1847. His most important pastorate in the Presbyterian denomination was in the Englewood First church, Chicago. In what was at first a very propitious pastorate there dissension later developed and Dr. Williams and a part of his congregation withdrew and organized a Cumberland Presbyterian church, which became to that denomination the First church of Chicago. The Cumberland General Assembly held one of its sessions in Dr. Williams's church. Later he was called to the Cumberland church of Memphis on Court street. and there he continued until retiring from the active ministry two or three years ago. Although Dr. Williams had been a personal seceder from Presbyterianism, he became an ardent advocate of the reunion of the Cumberland denomination with the mother church, and was very happy to become a Presbyterian again in 1906.

RECENT EVANGELISTIC NEWS

Missouri—Evangelist H. P. Dunlop closed a good meeting at Shelbyville and opened at Highland, Kan., Dec. 7, where a thorough preparation has been made by Rev. L. C. Stumpf, pastor.

South Dakota—The churches of Rapid City have joined in a tablernacle series of meetings under the lead of Evangelist Bromley and his singer, who are next to conduct similar meetings in Sturgis.

Tennessee—A series of evangelistic meetings in rural churches is being conducted under the direction of the evangelistic committee of Union Presbytery. The pastors and stated supplies are cooperating and going by twos to the various churches.

Wisconsin—Rev. H. P. Dunlop of Chicago recently conducted a very successful series of evangelistic meetings in the church at Sherry. For two weeks he preached every evening to a well filled church. He also each morning delivered an address before the students of the Northwest Collegiate Institute.

Pennsylvania—Evangelists Hart and Magann of Madison, Wis., recently closed a successful tabernacle meeting at Paris, Ill., where over 700 conversions occurred. On the closing day there were 180. These evangelists are now starting a very hopeful tabernacle meeting with the churches of Ridgway and at the first invitation there were 115 conversions. Great crowds are in attendance.

Illinois—Special meetings are being held at First church, Edwardsville. Rev. James R. Sager, pastor, is in charge.—Dr. G. G. Jordan is conducting meetings at First church, Urbana.—Rev. Eva Ludgate of Wheaton, Ill., and her singer, Miss Winifred Baird, have just closed a three weeks' meeting at Fifth church, Springfield, Ill. There have been to date sixteen additions to the church as a result.

Ohio—Rev. H. G. Rice, minister of Overpeck, a home mission church, recently conducted a two weeks' meeting. Rev. Charles S. Williams of Cincinnati helped one evening. Besides the church school another Sunday school is nourished in Williamsdale, near by.—First church, Warren, is having exceptional success with a new form of evangelism consisting of cooperation between the pastor, Rev. Franklin P. Reinhold, and the people. An average attendance of 100 for the past month has been secured for the midweek prayer service.

Nebraska—Box Butte Presbytery met at Broadwater Nov. 17 and 18 in the new church which was dedicated the week previous. It is the purpose of presbytery to hold a series of evangelistic meetings in every church during the winter months. The meetings are to be conducted by the pastors themselves where fields have pastors, otherwise the various ministers will give a portion of their time to assist the weaker fields.—The church at Hubbell is enjoying a season of revival, the pastor, Rev. F. C. Bostrom, being assisted by Rev. James M. Hamilton of Hebron. Several improvements have been made to the church property.

Iowa—There were 103 conversions on the closing night of the evangelistic services recently held by Evangelist Rayburn at Fort Dodge, Iowa. The total conversions were nearly 450. The local papers gave large space to the meetings and the whole town was stirred.—West Liberty revival meetings lasting four weeks closed Nov. 23 with 126 conversions. Rev. W. A. Tetley of Missouri was the evangelist. A young people's class with Rev. D. M. Dowlin as teacher increased in six weeks from four to forty-five.—The Ostrom tabernacle meeting closed Dec. 7 at Iowa City. Several points outside of Iowa City were visited by the evangelist and his workers, who were greeted by large audiences.—R. Hayes Willis has just closed a work of three weeks in Maxwell. Mr. Willis has begun similar meetings in the English and Newbern churches.

Anxious for Safety of Pastor

Rev. A. Vander Meer, pastor at Harbor Springs, Mich., disappeared a week or more ago and friends in Chicago were leading the search for him. He was graduated from McCormick Seminary in 1912 and was a member of the Church of the Covenant when in the seminary.

MARRIAGE

Young-Kimble—Charles Young and Miss Mabel Irene Kimble, both of Overpeck, Ohio, were married Nov. 27 by Rev. G. H. Rice in the manse at Seven Mile, Ohio.

THE CALL TO CHURCH

The ringing of the church bell is a call to worship. As a part of the solemn service of the church, it ought to have such tone and quality as insensibly to influence the mind to higher thoughts. Only the liquid-toned, clear ringing call, sounding upon the air sweetly and melodiously, should be used. Blymyer bells are of that kind. They are durable and cost little. If your bell sounds harsh, your church ought to exchange it for a better one.

Let us send you a catalogue and price list, so you can see how cheaply you can enrich your call to worship. Fifty years experience.

LARGEST VARIETY OF BIBLES

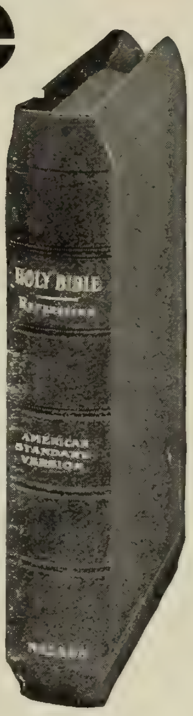
Both in the KING JAMES and AMERICAN STANDARD VERSIONS in all sizes of type and all styles of binding

NELSON'S BIBLES ARE THE BEST

Because our long experience of over 50 years in Bible making enables us to give you the very best expert workmanship and quality. Nelson's Bibles are famed for their beauty and their strong durable bindings. All our Bibles are bound in our own bindery under our direct supervision, and no expense has been spared in obtaining all the latest appliances in bookmaking and most expert workmen, so that every Bible we make is absolutely dependable. Our thin India Paper Editions are the latest word in Bible printing.

The American Standard Bible

(EDITED BY THE AMERICAN REVISION COMMITTEE)



The best version of the English Bible ever produced, because it is translated from the oldest and most authentic manuscripts in existence, by the greatest biblical scholars the world has ever known.

The paragraphic division is recognized as an indisputable merit, because it is the natural form and brings the reader closer to the original message.

The International Lesson Committee decided by a unanimous resolution to use the text of the American Standard Bible in the uniform and new graded Sunday School Lessons because it is more true to the original and requires less explanation than any other.

THE AMERICAN STANDARD BIBLE is used and recommended by all the great religious bodies in the United States, and has received the endorsement of all the leading educational institutions, being used in Universities, Theological Seminaries, Colleges, the International Sunday-school Publications of all the religious publishing houses and the Young Men's Christian Association.

IT is a noble work, destined to become the accepted Bible of the majority of the Anglo-Saxon race; and we are tempted to wish that it might be adopted as the one final revision of the English-speaking world.—London Quarterly Review.

THE American Standard Bible brings the plain reader more closely into contact with the exact thought of the sacred writers than any other version now current in Christendom.—From the Revisers' Preface.

American Standard Version Edited by the American Revision Committee

This is the most useful Bible published in recent years. The Topical helps give all the great topics in alphabetical order, showing the teachings of the Bible on all subjects and in the very language of the Bible itself.

Contains 25 new and instructive Outline Maps throughout the text—a very valuable feature by which the reader can locate the places mentioned in the sacred text while reading the narrative. Also the Topical Helps, in which the great themes of the Bible are arranged in alphabetical order and properly classified under heads and sub-heads—all the knowledge of the Bible at your fingers' ends. Printed on fine white paper and Nelson's India paper. Prices 90 cents to $7.20.

The American Standard Bibles and Testaments are made in over 200 styles, and we can supply a book for every need and occasion.

Around the Shop

The Around-the-Shop Man long ago made the acquaintance of that more or less useful being, the person who goes about looking for things to find fault with. He lives in almost every community and, after he has been properly classified by his associates, men who want to be elected to office go out of their way to incur his criticism so that they may become popular.

Happily, he does not take The Continent. Once in a while he borrows a copy and writes to the Editor, but he severely ignores this Dispensary of Optimism. The welcome guests here are in two classes—those who tell us in a friendly way how they think we can do some things better, or do some better things; and those who encourage us not by flagrant flattery but by spontaneous approval.

Here, for example:

"Dear A.-t.-S. Man: I knew you would make me do it finally. For a long time my appreciation of The Continent has been urging me to write and tell you about it. I have read it with relish, even before it was The Continent. It was always worth while, but in the issue of Dec. 4 you have—simply outdone yourselves, you folks who put it together. Yet I shall not be surprised when a later number beats it. Too numerous for detail are its good things, but I cannot forbear to speak of the first page editorial. It does the heart good to see the vital verities of the gospel so clearly and strongly presented."—E. S. J., Tennessee.

Have you ever thought what it means to a missionary in a remote foreign field to read a paper like The Continent every week? This may be a suggestion to you:

"I have read The Continent for years, and on the field especially it is one of my greatest pleasures. The church paper is a constant reminder that we are not forgotten by the friends at home and that we are not working alone, in an obscure corner of the world, but are part of the greatest movement in all the ages. And we often need such a thought as this to keep us faithful."—L. S., Siam.

And if you think The Continent's service is limited to the exact number of its subscribers—and, by the way, you can know that exact number if you wish it—just ponder this typical note:

"The paper has been in our family since it first started and I expect to have it while I live. It may do the Around-the-Shop Man good to know that it is read by a number. I have been away, so father reads it and sends it down to me. The family here all read it and I send it back to Chicago to a young lady. Her family read it and give it to another family—an old couple who cannot afford to take it. So you see we read it!"—M. C. W., Chicago.

Bradford Horton, Man

By RICHARD SILL HOLMES
The late corresponding editor of The Continent.

It is a simple tale, but with a plot which holds interest throughout; and the humor and pathos, comedy and heart tragedy that enter into it make it a story that will commend itself strongly to all who enjoy wholesome fiction. Bradford Horton is not a hero plucked from the romantic ages, nor an effeminate lover whom nobody in these days expects to find in real life. You want to shake hands with him and make friends right at the start.

A LOOK AHEAD
WITH THE CONTINENT FAMILY

J. A. Macdonald

has written a fish story for The Continent: "With Henry van Dyke on a Salmon River." With such a fisherman as Dr. van Dyke along the excursion was a notable one. Rev. Tertius van Dyke and George A. Warburton, the Y. M. C. A. man, were also members of this party, and Newfoundland was the scene. Mingled with the fishing—and there was good sport—were disquisitions on Tennyson and other poets, Dr. van Dyke telling of his days with the great English poet shortly before his death.

It is an article well worth reading, and written by a man who is known all over the land as editor of The Toronto Globe, an exponent of universal peace, and a commanding fighter for righteousness. This article will appear in an early issue of The Continent.

Stories of the way in which members of The Continent family have made successful investments will be told by themselves in the issue of January 1. These chapters from life show some of the sacrifices of ministers who own mortgages and yet have never received more than $530 a year salary. Ways to help the children to save and just how to invest funds in small amounts will be told in this special number.

A Christmas Hymn

"Let us now go even unto Bethlehem."

Come, let us join ourselves with them
Who go to see in Bethlehem
The marvel that the angel spake—
A Saviour sent for sinners' sake.

Behold the cause of heaven's surprise—
Eternal Power in infant guise—
Love's condescending miracle,
The peasant Babe Immanuel.

Here majesty above all spheres
Abased to emptiness appears;
To poverty submitting thus,
God's Heir spurns wealth to richen us.

The stabled beasts draw close to him,
As welcome as the seraphim;
If these he loves, how rather then
He will receive the least of men.

O humble Child, what praise can we
Apportion that is worthy thee,
Whom pride cannot forbid to bend
To lowest souls who need a friend?

The gratitude which most is meet
Fills hearts rejoicing to repeat
How Love for our salvation sues—
The happy Bethlehem "good news."

Hard Battle at Tampico; Villa's Outrageous Conduct

Mexico again focused the world's attention last week with a fierce battle at the port of Tampico adjoining the great oil fields which are Mexico's richest developed resources aside from wealth in ores. After several days and nights of fighting the attacking rebels were driven back by the fire of two gunboats and federal field artillery. The rebels retired in good order, taking with them twenty-three locomotives and hundreds of cars, and there was a threat that the assault would be renewed. The battle was fought under the eyes of an international fleet. Rear Admiral Fletcher, acting in cooperation with the British admiral, Sir Christopher Craddock, and the commander of the German cruiser in the harbor, set off a neutral zone and notified both combatants not to fire into the boundaries of the zone nor to molest foreigners, nor to injure the oil tanks or other foreign property. Some 5,000,000 barrels of oil are estimated to be in storage at this point. Most of the foreigners, who were numerous in Tampico, fled from the town to the warships. The British admiral chartered a steamship for his compatriots who wished to get away, as did also the German and later the American navy department.

The capture of the important city of Chihuahua was enough to give substantial standing to the revolutionist cause. The late Francisco Madero had made less headway when President Diaz abdicated than have the forces opposing Dictator Huerta. But the Madero revolution did not partake of the nature of brigandage nor was it scattered in the hands of half a dozen self-important chiefs as is the case at present. General "Pancho" Villa's occupation of Chihuahua served further to reveal his essentially barbaric character. Instead of proceeding southward to attack the capital city or to the coast to assist in the attack on Tampico or in other ways cooperating with the various rebel forces, he installed himself in the palace building, seized a large department store, a clothing factory and other stores owned by Spaniards, also a brewery, and ordered all the Spanish citizens, including the progressive merchants, to leave the country forever within ten days. He called a meeting of merchants of all nationalities and told them they must pay him large sums of money "to support the revolution," and insisted that the constitutionalist scrip should be accepted as legal tender money. Louis Terrasas, Jr., son of the rich Mexican land owner who recently fled from Chihuahua to El Paso, Texas, was taken by the rebels and held as a hostage after he had sought refuge in the British vice consulate. Spanish nuns and priests were driven out after their money had been taken from them. The United States consul was asked by the Spaniards to protect them, but the rebels would not allow him to send a cipher message to the state department. The German consul protested to Villa against the exaction of tribute from Germans and was told that he—the consul—would be escorted to the border if he persisted in his protest. Villa then impudently informed all the foreign consuls that they would have to obey rebel orders. Secretary of State Bryan sent a special messenger to Villa to make vigorous demand for decent and humane treatment of all foreigners in Chihuahua and respect for their property.

At Mexico City the congress, at Huerta's dictation, declared the presidential election of October 26 null and void and called a new election for the first Sunday of next July, meanwhile authorizing the dictator to continue in office. The action of the congress in decreeing that Huerta shall retain the presidency is contrary to the Mexican constitution, which provides that a provisional president may not remain in power more than eleven months. Such a term for Huerta would expire in January, but the constitution is no longer regarded seriously at the Mexican capital.

Radical Coalition Cabinet for France

Advanced Socialists and Radicals will dominate the new French cabinet announced last week. Senator Gaston Doumergue heads the ministry, taking the portfolio of foreign affairs. Joseph Caillaux is minister of finance; Ernest Monis minister of marine. Caillaux and Monis are former premiers. Of the dozen names only two are regarded as moderates.

The new premier, who was not by any means President Poincare's first choice for the position, is 50 years of age, has served twenty years in parliament and has also had foreign experience. The chamber of deputies has already given the new government a vote of confidence, and it is apparent that the fall of the Barthou ministry has not caused more than a momentary disturbance in French public affairs. It is, however, a source of wonderment to the average American that cabinets can succeed cabinets at short intervals, as has happened scores of times since 1870, without in any way affecting the fundamental stability of the French republic.

German Chancellor Defies the Reichstag

In contrast to France, where the immediate responsiveness of the ministry to parliament has again been shown, stand the methods of Germany. There the imperial chancellor, Dr. von Bethmann-Hollweg, last week defiantly told the reichstag that he had no intention of resigning because of the recent vote of nonconfidence in connection with the Zabern garrison incident in Alsace. Dr. von Bethmann-Hollweg defied the deputies to pass a constitutional amendment making the chancellor and the other ministers responsible to the reichstag, and protested against any attempted invasion of the emperor's prerogatives such as had been suggested by a possible refusal to pass the budget appropriation. The chancellor declared that he knew the majority of the German nation was unwilling that the emperor's power should be subjected to socialistic restrictions.

Herr Scheidemann, the Socialist leader, in his speech proposing a constitutional amendment, lamented that the clever statesmanship and the policy of peace shown abroad by Germany had not been manifested at home. He asserted that the present chancellor meant well, but had failed to understand his times.

New King of Albania Prepares to Take Throne

Prince Wilhelm of Wied, the choice of the great powers for king of the new state of Albania, is preparing to leave the German army, where he has had a successful career, to ascend his somewhat shaky throne at Avlona next month. His wife, the princess Wied, is a leader in German artistic and aristocratic circles, and has a notable reputation as a hostess at Berlin and in her villa at Wied on the banks of a beautiful lake. The prince's friends declare that he is animated by a soldierly sense of duty rather than by selfish ambition, as the life he had in prospect is one of comfort and comparative ease, whereas the king of the wild and unruly Albanians will have constant anxieties and heavy responsibilities. The little kingdom is expected to have Germany and Austria-Hungary as its chief supporters, besides the tacit approval of the remainder of Europe aside from its jealous Balkan neighbors.

Nobel Peace Prize Awarded to Senator Root

America has once more been honored by the award of one of the Nobel prizes, this time the award for distinguished services to the cause of international peace being made to Senator Elihu Root of New York. Senator Root's award is for the year 1912, but was not announced until last week at Christiania, Norway. The peace prize for 1913 was at the same time given to Senator LaFontaine of Brussels, Belgium, who was formerly president of the permanent international peace bureau at Bern, Switzerland. The money value of the prizes is $40,000. The only other peace prize to come to America was in 1906, when Theodore Roosevelt was the recipient.

The basis of the award to Senator Root was his work in the pacification of the Philippines and Cuba, and in the handling of the American-Japanese dispute and for his other contributions to the cause of international peace and good will. As secretary of war, secretary of state and as senator he delivered some masterly utterances which are intellectual and scholarly rather than popular in tone. Mr. Root has just been appointed a member of the court of arbitration at The Hague to which will be submitted claims of British, French and Spanish citizens against Portugal.

Senator Root has lately been "boomed" for the next Republican presidential nomination by ex-President Taft (who said that he himself was out of politics), Andrew Carnegie and Senator Gallinger of New Hampshire.

Another recent Nobel honor which attracted wide attention was the prize for literature, which was given to the Hindu poet Tagore. This is the first time an East Indian has been thus recognized, leaving Rudyard Kipling out of consideration.

Large Fund for Red Cross Headquarters

The American National Red Cross has obtained $300,000 of subscriptions to complete the fund and make available the $400,000 appropriated by Congress for the erection of a memorial building at Washington in honor of the women of the civil war and for use as headquarters for the Red Cross—such was the announcement made by President Wilson at the ninth annual meeting of the organization in Washington last week. The chief subscribers were Mrs. Russell Sage, Mrs. E. H. Harriman, John D. Rockefeller, James A. Scrymser and Jacob H. Schiff. The latter made a special endowment of $100,000, the income to be used for town and country nursing service. Mrs. Whitelaw Reid, chairman of the committee on this service, had offered to contribute $2,500 a year to the same fund. It was explained that the work of the Red Cross visiting nurses in small towns and rural communities is becoming increasingly important. Mr. Schiff in his address foresaw the end of war and urged the organization of more societies to carry forward the cause of world peace. He believed that the time was almost in sight when mine disasters, catastrophes at sea and other great calamities will be prevented.

President Wilson expressed gratification at being officially connected with the Red Cross and voiced admiration for its work and workers. He referred particularly to the aid given last spring in relieving distress in the regions of the country visited by flood. The President personally awarded four Red Cross medals for meritorious service, one of them going to W. A. Compton of Ohio for the part he took in helping flood sufferers. An award of medals was also announced for Governor Cox, John H. Patterson and other Ohio men for service rendered during the Ohio flood. Medals for services performed during the Balkan war were given to Major C. F. Ford of the medical corps of the United States army, Mrs. W. W. Rockhill, wife of the American minister to Turkey; John B. Jackson of Bucharest, Roumania, and Hoffman Philip of Constantinople.

William Deering, Manufacturer and Layman of Note, Dies

William Deering, one of the nation's noted manufacturers and a stalwart layman of the Methodist Church, died on the 9th instant at his winter home near Miami, Florida, aged 88 years. A dozen years ago he retired from active work after a life full of varied and useful activities. Northwestern University, Garrett Biblical Institute and Wesley hospital, all in or near Chicago, owe much to his generosity, for he gave to them not only of his wealth but also of his time and exceptional business ability. Up to three years ago his gifts to the university aggregated nearly a million dollars. He built a school for orphans and was a large yearly contributor to home missionary and church extension work. The total of his benevolences is not known.

William Deering

Born in Maine of Puritan ancestry, Mr. Deering at first intended to become a physician, but gave up the idea to assist his father in a woolen mill, then taking up the dry goods line. Later he became interested in western farming lands and visited Chicago in 1870. A Methodist minister who had had to abandon the ministry because of the loss of his voice interested Mr. Deering in agricultural machinery, the plant being established at Plano, Illinois, before its removal to Chicago. From the manufacture of harvesters he passed to the twine binder, an experiment which ultimately proved to be a great financial success. The Deering works steadily grew until 9,000 operators were employed, with branches and agents all over the world. The plant and organization became in 1902 an important part of the International Harvester Company. Mr. Deering's home since 1874 was in the Chicago suburb of Evanston. He is survived by his widow and two sons. Mr. Deering is described as "a good citizen who never sought to become conspicuous," a high grade American of the old school.

The Miners' Strikes in Michigan and Colorado

Indications last week were that the Christmas season would be a gloomy time in the Michigan copper country, where the miners, nearly 15,000 in number, were still on strike after several months of discontent and disorder due to idleness and the presence of imported strikebreakers and mine guards. State troops in limited number have acted as a deterrent, but have not been able to prevent dynamite outrages, bloodshed and fatalities. For example, members of a party of sixty nonunion men on board a train bound for Calumet were attacked in Chicago as a minor incident of the little war.

THE NIGHT BEFORE CHRISTMAS

Governor Ferris has refused to withdraw the militia as requested by the Western Federation of Miners, and has also refused to increase the number of soldiers on duty as requested by the mine owners. The persistent refusal of the employers to recognize the organization of the employees is apparently the crux of the dangerous situation.

The general public, usually an innocent and suffering bystander in labor troubles, has been aroused by the inability of the civil authorities to cope with lawlessness, and a citizens' alliance was organized at Calumet and Houghton which declared its opposition to the union, or at least to the violent tactics with which the union is charged.

In Colorado, where the coal fields have been under martial law, the national officers of the striking miners' organization—the United Mine Workers—have drawn the fire of a United States grand jury. President John P. White and ten others were lately indicted for conspiracy in restraint of interstate commerce in violation of the antitrust law and "for an attempt to secure a monopoly of labor." Other indictments were returned against miners on the charge of property depredations. In the course of a long report the grand jury recommended that in case of dispute both parties should be required by law to operate the mines pending a settlement.

Religious World

Will the Vatican Abandon Temporal Power?

The most significant development of news last week touching the religious interests of the world was the remarkable dispatch sent from Rome to The Daily News of London declaring that Pope Pius X. has finally come to the momentous decision that the pretensions of the papacy to civil power must be given up. According to this dispatch, both Archbishop Udine, speaking before the Catholic Congress in Milan, and Count Della Torre, speaking for the Catholic Popular Union, of which he is president, have publicly declared that if the Italian government will unite with other Catholic powers in assuring the pope against interference with his religious prerogatives, the pope is ready to abandon his contention that the Italian king is an interloper and a usurper in Rome. It is declared that two such loyal Catholic personages never could have spoken to this effect without instructions direct from the Vatican, and therefore the proposal is regarded as an official surrender on the part of the papacy to what Pius IX. and Leo XIII. always persisted in declaring an impossible condition.

Such a change of front at the Vatican is, of course, irreconcilable with the papal claim of infallibility, but no large-hearted man will affront Catholicism with any great ado over this loss of face. Rather should Christendom rejoice that the simple dictates of practical wisdom have at length become strong enough in the Vatican to make the pope and his advisers willing to do the sensible thing, however much "face" it costs. The new policy would be justified, if on no other ground, by the instantaneous relief which it would bring American Catholics from the unhappy suspicion of their patriotic loyalty which is now so prevalent in the United States. To that suspicion, as matters stand today, the only possible answer is that American Catholics are not consistent with the theoretical position of their church, for if they did believe what the church teaches about the temporal power of the pope, they assuredly could not be good Americans. Though The Continent, preferring to think them inconsistent rather than treacherous, does believe that they are average good Americans for the most part, it certainly would be a comfort to them and a comfort to their Protestant neighbors to see the inconsistency removed by their church acknowledging frankly in its own official documents what its prelates and priests universally say in the United States—that the church has no more right to interfere with civil affairs than the state has with religion. This is a proposition in which, if put forward with good faith, every Protestant could join with the heartiest accord.

Great Approaching Assemblage of Students

The Continent has already alluded to the importance of the forthcoming Student Volunteer convention at Kansas City, which will be the seventh of the quadrennial gatherings of this profoundly influential movement. But new emphasis as the time draws near is requisite to remind the Christian world once more of the tremendous power which has attended these conventions in the past and may be expected in even more emphatic degree to characterize the event now at hand.

As The Continent has previously stated, the leaders of the movement have thought better to hold the convention this year during the holiday recess of the colleges rather than between first and second semesters in February, as has been the custom heretofore. In this way it is believed that a larger delegation of professors and students from the colleges can be obtained with less interruption to college work. The convention will begin therefore in Kansas City's great convention hall on Wednesday afternoon, December 31, at 2:30. It will continue from that time until the evening of the following Sunday, January 4.

The purpose of the convention is not primarily, as the public commonly supposes, to induce young students to dedicate themselves to mission service in the foreign field. A very large percentage of the students attending will no doubt be those who have already taken the Volunteer pledge. But other students are equally welcome, and although of course the opportunities of mission work will be frankly stated to them, no pressure will be exercised to secure immediate decisions from those as yet unpledged. Indeed, the convention is planned to take into view the opportunities and obligations of those who go to foreign work, but also of those who remain at home to help solidify the home base, which is an obviously necessary element of a permanent missionary policy.

Much attention will also be given to considering wise and effective means of maintaining the spiritual life of American colleges—an aspect of the convention to which it is hoped the large company of professors sure to be in attendance will give particular attention.

In accordance with the Student Volunteer Movement's invariable custom, no announcement of program is made in advance. But it is known that the principal speakers will be those leaders of unfailing power who have influenced the student life of America so deeply already—John R. Mott, Robert E. Speer, Samuel M. Zwemer and J. A. Macdonald. Dr. Zwemer is coming back to America from Cairo, Egypt, especially for the sake of meeting the American students in this great gathering.

Much of the time of the convention will be devoted to sectional conferences. Here discussion rather than speaking will be the order of the hour. At times the convention delegates will be thus divided according to their several interest in various features of missionary duty, and again by their interest in the different fields of missionary labor. Separate denominational conferences will also be held. Only those will be admitted to the convention who are designated as delegates by their own colleges or by denominational church boards.

Southern Methodists Develop New Chautauqua

The Methodists of the South are aiming to duplicate the Chautauqua of the North very much as the Presbyterians of the South at Montreat have already duplicated the Winona of the North. The site which the Methodists have chosen lies in that long intermountain valley which runs between the Great Smoky Range and the Blue Ridge, westward from Asheville. Near the mountain town of Waynesville, North Carolina, a great power dam has been put in for the generation of electricity, and behind the dam there has been backed up a beautiful mountain lake, whose surface is 3,000 feet above the level of the sea. This lake has been named Junaluska in commemoration of a famous Indian chief, who was well known to the early settlers throughout the region of the North Carolina mountains. The lake mirrors a particularly rugged section of mountain scenery, and the beauty of the site has already attracted many people to erect summer cottages on Junaluska's shores. The Southern Assembly Company, which will have the management of this important institution, has put up a beautiful auditorium and commodious hotels. The president of the company is Bishop James Adkins of Waynesville and the superintendent of the program is Dr. James Cannon of Richmond, Virginia, who is assisted by John R. Pepper of Memphis, Tennessee, and Dr. George R. Stuart of Knoxville, Tennessee.

—A second probation is always popular with those who would like to repeat their mistakes.

"On to Washington"

Crowd Exceeding Everything but Inauguration Throngs Makes a Living Prohibition Petition to Congress

The demonstration organized in Washington on December 10 by the National Anti-Saloon League and the National Women's Christian Temperance Union to impress Congress with the demand for a prohibition amendment to the national constitution, was a success astonishingly impressive in the point of numbers and enthusiasm. The proposal to turn out a thousand men and a thousand women to march on the capitol as a living petition was more than realized. Veteran attaches at the capitol building declared that the temperance crowd was the largest throng which ever visited the capitol on any other occasion than inauguration day.

The only shortcoming about the demonstration was the failure to get Congress to pay official heed to it. The national society working for woman suffrage had, only the week before, obtained a lengthy hearing before a congressional committee, and this official recognition had added a great deal to the respect which government circles felt for the cause represented. Just why the same measure of recognition was not obtained for the temperance forces is not yet known to the public, but the fact is that both houses of Congress went on their regular business quite disregardful of the tremendous crowd outside the building, which had come to make this significant demand for legislation.

The crowd was of course much too great to enter the capitol, and was massed upon the steps of the east front. Here Senator Morris Sheppard of Texas and Representative Richmond P. Hobson of Alabama came out to greet the visitors. To them the proposed form of amendment to the constitution was presented by Dr. Purley A. Baker, the national superintendent of the Anti-Saloon League, and other addresses were made by Ernest W. Cherrington of Westerville, Ohio, former Governor M. W. Patterson of Tennessee, Mrs. Lillian M. N. Stevens, national president of the Women's Christian Temperance Union, Mrs. Ella A. Boole, New York state president of the same organization, and Mrs. Mary Harris Armor of Georgia. The two national legislators already named responded.

Later each introduced the amendment in his respective house of Congress. Congressman Hobson, however, unfortunately marred the effect of the action by becoming involved on the floor in a bitter personal wrangle with one or two of his colleagues.

The evening of the same day a spirited and crowded mass meeting was held in Memorial Hall in Washington, where Senator Borah of Idaho made the principal address. The senator stated his position by remarking: "I cannot see why we recognize anything as a business in time of peace that must be closed to protect lives and homes during time of trouble." Sam Small of Georgia and John G. Woolley of Wisconsin made other addresses.

Editorial

The Restrictions of Religion

MOST OF OUR PRESENT reference to religion lays stress on its inspirations. It enlarges our life and our outlook. It opens to us wider fields of endeavor and enjoyment. We remind young people of the word, "At thy right hand there are pleasures forevermore," and nothing is more impossible than a "long-faced Christian." "Religion was never meant to make us gloomy." "No person in all the world ought to be as happy as a Christian." This is all familiar and important talk. Of course, it is true and deserves to be said.

Yet there is another phase of the truth which is mightily needed in these happy days. We must emphasize the fact that religion does make a difference somewhere. It does put reins on the life. It has its big round negatives which it speaks to every man who hears. It is possible to make too sharp a contrast between the ten commandments and the gospel. "Thou shalt not" is not an impossible gospel phrase. And unless we learn to take our religion with a joyful spirit of obedience, it will presently become irksome with its restrictions, or, what is worse, it will become valueless without restrictions. We can make the yoke of Christ easy by wearing it willingly, but we cannot have him without his yoke.

There are some things which religion forbids. The prophet Amos in his eighth chapter heaps scorn on those who chafed under religious restrictions because they prevented personal profit. They longed for the new moon to be gone, that they might sell grain. They chafed under the Sabbath because they wanted to set forth wheat, cheating while they did so. They felt the limitation of religious practices when they were eager to sell the poor for silver and the needy for a pair of shoes. They deserved the prophet's scorn, but it is at least to be said for them that they had the small grace to recognize the restriction. We have not a few in our own day who deny the right of the days or the seasons to be interposed between them and their personal wishes. Instead of longing for the Sabbath to be past, they disregard it and go on with their business. If they want to play golf on the Sabbath, they put up a sorry mouth about letting religion become a mere bondage, or they go their way indifferent to all restriction. What would Amos say to them but heap the more scorn on them?

It is immensely important not to blink the fact that a follower of Christ is supposed to have accepted the limitations of his faith along with its blessings. He may, to be sure, take all the limitations as blessings in which he has learned to rejoice. But he must take them, in all fairness, whether he can rejoice in them or not. Think of the one which concerned Amos—this very matter of days for worship and for stopping business and common pleasure. It is a peculiar confession of weakness when we grown-up men have to admit that we do not know what to do with ourselves if we are shut out of our business places or our game rooms, so that the Sabbath is a dreary day, which we are sorry to see come and glad to see go. There is large value of such arresting days by reason of their challenge of the better things in us. God knows those things have a deadly enough time at the best. We need a strong hand laid on us, and if we are faithful Christians we have that strong hand laid on us, to hold us still for a time until we think. We are not money-making machines. We are not professional grindstones, which must be always turning. Our Christian faith comes to restrict us, to hold us back, that our souls may have a chance to go forward.

Some of us even come to the point of using the supposed time of worship for meditation on our business or other plans. We pretend religious interest, but even while we look into the minister's face, we are in our offices in mind. The interest we have brought in may be worthy and noble in itself. For the business man, thought of business is a duty, but he needs the restraint of religion even there. He is not free as a Christian to adopt just any course that may be common. It means nothing final that others do this or that. Does his religion permit him to do it? That is the question for him.

So with pleasures. We are free for all the pleasures that are legitimate to men who profess our faith. There are some forbidden us. We cannot take our Lord with us into them. Our fathers may have been wrong in the list they made. They may have forbidden some innocent things, and may have put ban on that which should be free. Very well, but we have not helped the matter by casting off all restrictions, as though our faith were not meant to shut us up to the best things and to shut us out from the poor things of life. There are places we can go and practices we may adopt which will violate our Christian profession. We ought not to want to do those things, of course; but we have no right to do them even if we do want to. Our faith forbids.

An Age That Wants Religion Most of All

The beautiful Christmas issue of The Century Magazine includes amid a composite of other inspiriting features an article by Winston Churchill, the novelist, which exercises over the reader a peculiar holding power. This magazine contribution is essay, not fiction, and its title is "The Modern Quest for a Religion." But its thought is intimately connected with the same author's latest story, "The Inside of the Cup," and its earnestness attests the yearning and aspiration out of which that powerful tale sprang.

Were the essay taken sentence by sentence for analysis, there would be found, as there were in the novel, many things to which exception must be recorded—especially in relation to the author's persistent idea that the miraculous items of the Christian creed are impossible to sincere faith in this twentieth century. But even an exception as vital as this, from the viewpoint of established theology, it seems ungracious to emphasize under the spell of Mr. Churchill's fervor while he paints contemporary America as feverishly in search for religion. Scarcely any one else has put this characterization of the current times half so convincingly as does he.

To Mr. Churchill this is the outstanding distinction of the immediate present—something which differentiates today from even five years ago—a mighty, consuming hunger for food that will nourish the soul. The novelist submits that eras of the world's most grievous unrest have ever been the eras of its most thrilling spiritual revivals, and he believes that the epoch of singular unrest which ushered in the twentieth century has already run through those stages needful to convince men of the insufficiency of material and temporal satisfactions for the sustenance of an immortal race. Now has come the clock-stroke for spiritual things. The thirst for religion, Mr. Churchill believes, aches deep into the heart of humanity just now.

Who that is loyal to Jesus Christ can read such a description of the passing hour without a thrill which is all but a gasp? Here is this age of ours whose materialism, frivolity and degeneracy we have bewailed, scarcely daring to believe it could feel higher incentives than the lusts of this world, and now suddenly comes a far-looking man to tell us that the herbage of the world's own dry pastures is bitten down to the tasteless roots and famished sheep are looking for a shepherd.

If all this is true what an hour we have hit upon! It was for such a chance as this that Jesus himself came into the world—to find such hunger that he sent his apostles forth. Can Jesus then feed hungry America? It is the supreme test of church and gospel thus far. And we have to realize that the serious question about it all is not with him, but with those whom he has sent to speak for him—that is to say, with us Christians of today ourselves. Are we, who profess the name of Christ and stand for him in his church, alluring enough in our lives to turn searching men and women to him?

All the things which one at first thinks of saying to Mr. Churchill for the old dogmas of the church go silent on one's lips when, reading on through his article, one sees which way he is headed. Mr. Churchill, looking for religion, religion that will meet the need of this tremendous time, is going to Jesus. No matter what he doesn't believe, what he does believe is that Jesus is sufficient for humanity, now and forever. Mr. Churchill is declaring that "The Modern Quest for Religion" must end in Jesus. Certainly the church can cry nothing but "amen" to that—cry "amen" and pray for the better knowledge of Jesus that can demonstrate him indeed sufficient to all men's necessities.

Queenly Definition of the Mission Spirit

When Queen Wilhelmina, the royal lady of the Netherlands, sent from her palace a warm-hearted personal greeting to the Continuation Committee gathered at The Hague, she had the felicity to give an unusually vivid expression to the essential spirit of missions. After greetings of welcome to the committee, the queen wrote: "We also in the Netherlands are striving for unity and cooperation in the missionary field; and we are trying to understand other peoples, whose circumstances are unlike our own, in the spirit of love as true disciples of Him who came to serve mankind."

There you have it—the very spirit which ought to pulse in every form of mission endeavor everywhere—"trying to understand other peoples in a spirit of love." In Africa that means "thinking black," as Dan Crawford puts it. In China it means thinking Chinese, and in India thinking Indian. And in America, as the immigrants continue to pour in, it must mean thinking Bohemian and Hungarian and Polish and Italian and Slovak and Lithuanian and so on indefinitely. Mission work is the endless process of putting yourself in every other fellow's place—"trying to understand in the spirit of love." Bringing religion to people as something of our own which we feel virtuous for bestowing on them, never gets much of anywhere; an imposed religion never sticks tight. Real mission success attends only the love that can see in the least and worst of people—the most distant and strange of races—fellow creatures under God's care and compassion as much as we. That sort of love enters into life's deep places with those whom it goes to help, and imposes on them nothing but imparts everything.

"The Last Full Measure of Devotion"

One of the tragedies of the magnificent campaign which the Men and Religion Movement has waged against commercialized vice in Atlanta, is the death of Miss Edith Appleyard. Miss Appleyard was a southern gentlewoman of the highest cultivation and a peculiarly delicate nature, who had served for years as house mother in Agnes Scott College at Decatur, Georgia. There it was her duty and privilege to be "next friend" to many high-bred young women from the choicest homes of the South. But she heard that the Atlanta committee fighting this antivice crusade wanted somebody to manage the home they were opening for the care of unhappy girls rescued from the life of lust. And Miss Appleyard asked to be allowed to resign her pleasant and honorable place with the pure daughters of sheltered homes, and come to lay her life alongside the ruined and degraded victims of vice—most of them incompetents intellectually as well as spiritually.

So perfect was the sacrifice, yet so spontaneous and unconscious, that the committee dared not protest even though it marveled, and Miss Appleyard took charge of the poorly appointed, inconvenient and isolated "Martha Home" as happy as a bride entering under the rooftree of a beloved bridegroom. She herself had love enough to hallow the place all in her own heart, and repeatedly in the midst of the work, laughing at its trials and smothering its sorrows in her pity, she declared herself gladder than ever in her life before. Her ministry was as efficient as it was unselfish, and the unselfishness of it soon overran her physical strength. In the sheer tirelessness of her unlimited love for the girls she was leading up to light, Miss Appleyard destroyed her own health utterly. Recently she died, as truly a martyr as any of the saints who ever went rejoicing to the stake of flame. Surely it has been a beautiful and sanctifying offering which has been laid on the altar of devotion for the outcasts of Atlanta.

An Admirable Example of Slow and Sure

One big reason for the comfortable assurance of Presbyterians that the Board of Relief and Sustentation is going to get the $10,000,000 endowment it wishes to gather for aged ministers, is the steady system which Secretary Foulkes and his associates are putting into the work. They swing on their tasks like a crew of men at the oars. They make no wild dashes and aren't heating up themselves or anybody else into any fever. Instead they are going about their task just as calmly and just as industriously as a farmer would plow up and harrow a field from which he expects to get a crop next havest time.

The board's remarkable advertising campaign—the most discriminating, best ordered and best adapted popular appeal ever yet made for any church enterprise in this country—has corresponded well to the farmer's soil preparation and seed sowing. Meanwhile its splendidly generaled presbyterial campaigns have begun already to show something of the firstfruits of harvest. And in them also the board's enterprise moves with the slow steadiness that spells sureness. There is concentration instead of scatterment of effort, and the job is done thoroughly in one place before the force at work moves on to the next stand. Yes, this ten million proposition is going to win; its extra good beginning is a guaranty of its good ending.

Tithing Goes On Though "Storehouse" Fails

That conception of tithing which has developed what is known in many churches as "the storehouse plan" has failed to prosper well in a considerable portion of the places where it has been tried. This policy, based on a very stringent interpretation of a passage in the prophecy of Malachi, insists that it is a Christian's duty to present a tenth of his income undiminished to the treasury of his church, leaving the church officers to distribute the sum to such forms of benevolence as they deem wise. But the operation of this rigid idea has collided with a good many obstacles. The responsibility of apportioning all these gifts among many clamorous Christian causes involves great peril of differing and contentious opinion, and the task is at least as apt to be a means of trouble as a means of grace. Under such disputes the plan has broken down frequently.

But The Continent is happy to learn from Thomas Kane, the best authority in the United States on tithing experiences, that the collapse of the storehouse plan does not result in an abandonment of tithing. In all instances which he has been able to trace the tithers who participated in the storehouse plan have gone on tithing, even when they withdrew from that particular agreement. The duty of giving the tenth to the Lord's work continues to command their judgment and conscience, even after they have concluded that it is not a duty to let the church distribute it. And The Continent cannot think that in these cases there is any loss. Rather there seems a distinct gain when the individual himself assumes the obligation of apportioning his tithe to the different forms of service in which he believes the Lord will be most honored by his gifts.

—The four representatives of the joint executive committee who are leading the present United Missionary Campaign for the Presbyterian Church—Messrs. McConaughy, McGarrah, Breeze and Hill—are frequently embarrassed, as they go among the churches, because people insist on classifying them still, according to their former affiliations with boards and synods and presbyteries, as either foreign mission men or home mission men. As a matter of fact in their present relation they are not to be classified; they are neither foreign men nor home men but just mission men. This ancient distinction has been emphasized so long that it is hard for the churches to realize that it is now ruled out of date. That is the very meaning of a "united" campaign for missions. That campaign stands for all sorts of missionary service in places both near and distant, and that is what these leaders are bound to stand for—what they are desiring to express in all they do. So it is no wonder that they are embarrassed by introductions in public places implying that they belong specially to the Board of Home Missions or the Board of Foreign Missions. They belong to the whole church.

—A friend who has noted what The Continent said lately about Professor Schweitzer's leaving his university chair in Strasburg and going to Africa as a missionary, tells us that we were wrong in supposing that no theological teacher had ever done the like before. He cites an example from America—from the Reformed theological seminary at Lancaster, Pennsylvania. Three years ago Dr. Christopher Noss, professor of systematic theology in that institution, resigned and accepted the commission of the foreign board of his church to go as an evangelist into the district surrounding Sendai, Japan. And he went not alone but with Mrs. Noss and seven of their nine children. Dr. Noss, however, had strong ties on the mission field and strong drawings thither in his special knowledge and equipment. Prior to his election to the Lancaster chair Dr. Noss taught seven years in the Reformed mission schools at Sendai, and in his comfortable place in America he could not put away from himself the memory of the spiritual destitution of the Japanese. So he went back—this time not to teach but to preach.

—"When in Rome do as the Romans do" is an axiom which, it seems, Colonel Roosevelt neither adopts nor rejects teetotally. He takes it sort of half-and-half. On his journey through South America he does partly as the South Americans do and partly as he would do by his own custom if he were at home. In Santiago, Chile, on Sabbath he attended Protestant church service in the morning, which was undoubtedly his own preference, but in the afternoon he attended the races, which obviously was his concession to the habits of his hosts. There are many of Colonel Roosevelt's friends in his own land, however, who would be gratified if his Sabbath doings abroad showed a little more evidence of fixed Sabbath ideas which convenience and concession were not permitted to alter.

—Dr. F. B. Meyer, secretary of the Free Church Council in England, has been so impressed and depressed by the prevalence of social impurity that he had the council make an official request of Harold Begbie for a book on the church's responsibility for this form of sin. Begbie has just finished the book. The title is "The Weakest Link," which is the author's way of saying that he thinks the church is least able with saving power when it comes face to face with the victims of licentiousness.

—Dr. W. R. Taylor of Rochester is "very bold" in affirming the eternal lordship of Jesus as the ineradicable center of Christian theology. To his people in a recent sermon Dr. Taylor said: "You might as well try to tear the bleeding heart from the breast of a living man without killing him as to take the doctrine of the divinity of Christ out of the New Testament without destroying it."

DR. JOWETT'S MESSAGE

Helpers of Your Joy

WHEN THE APOSTLE uses this phrase, "helpers of your joy," what is it fills the mind? What does he mean by joy? And, having asked the question, I feel I am incompetent to give an adequate answer. I have not sufficient plumbline to sound the depths, for to fully appreciate the apostle's conception of joy I must be able to comprehend the roominess and the experiences of his soul. And one of our standing difficulties in the interpretation of this great apostle is that we just lose ourselves in his moral and spiritual magnificence. We just wander about in a sense of vastness. When I turn to some of the more exalted passages in the apostle's letters I feel as I do when I listen to some stupendous piece of music. I feel the power of it and I realize the wonder of it, and at the same time I am conscious that it is far beyond me. I would like to know just what Wagner meant by that marvelous phrase, what was in his soul when it was born! But to know it adequately I should have to be Wagner himself. So I have to listen and wonder and lose myself in the large and astounding glory.

Large Souls Must Have Large Satisfactions

And so it is with the apostle's usage of such words as "peace" and "faith" and "grace" and "joy." They are significant of experiences which demand a large life for their understanding. Take the word "joy," with which we are immediately concerned. What do we mean by the word? A man's pleasure defines his measure. That is a very sure and serious test in life. And, therefore, to enter even into the "joy" of the apostle Paul it is needful that I should share the fullness of his spiritual life. But despite all this and our own feebleness of wing to soar to those heavenly heights, there are some things which may be positively said about the apostle's conception of joy.

First of all, it most certainly is not what is commonly called happiness. There are many people who may claim to have happiness who cannot claim to have joy. Happiness is often only good spirits. It is frequently nothing more than physical exuberance; or it may be something a little higher; it may be emotional warmth, a feeling of lightness and congeniality. I do not for a moment disparage this disposition. It is itself a great gift for which anybody ought to be deeply grateful. But it is a very transient thing and very uncertain in its tenure. A whiff of cold adversity or a sudden sickness and it is frequently gone.

Happiness is too often like an oil lamp; a storm can blow it out. But joy is like radium, and it is unaffected by the severest blast. Therefore we have the most paradoxical statements concerning spiritual joy given us in the word of God. "As sorrowful yet always rejoicing." "We also rejoice in tribulation." Joy is evidently something which persists through day and night, through calm and tempest, on rough seas and when the sea is calm as an inland lake. But not for a moment is it suggested that the Christian life is one of ceaseless ecstasy. God does not feed us on cake but bread, not on stimulating wines but on water. If life were one continuous rapture we should be speedily exhausted, whereas "the joy of the Lord is our strength."

Great Joy Depends on Live Linkings with God

And another thing that can be positively said about the apostolic joy is this: It always has a Godward aspect. It always concerns the kingdom of Christ, and is always directly related to the Lord Jesus himself. Whenever the apostle speaks of joy he is thinking of something which has immediate communion with the risen Lord. "Rejoice in the Lord." Joy is like a plant which is rooted in grace. It is like the mystic lamp of the prophet's dream whose quiet shining flame was fed by oil which flowed from the two olive trees that sent their branches round it.

Now we may perhaps get a glimpse of the apostle's meaning when he aspires to be the helper of other people's joys. He is ambitious that his relationship with the Corinthian Christians should deepen and purify and enrich their joy. And how can he do it? And how can we share his services and be his fellow laborers in this beneficent ministry?

Well, first of all, what about the people who have already found this joy? How can we be their helpers? And how can we deepen it? By being willing to share it. That is a great fact and law in human life. If you have a joy and share it you double it. On the other hand, if you let others share their joy with you you double theirs. We are then face to face with a very simple ministry of helpfulness. We can let people tell us their joys. We can offer them willing ears and by listening to them we shall multiply their pleasure. But oh, these reticences of our modern life! These frigid silences about the highest things! These impoverishing restraints! One of the great needs of our Christian life is that we be more open with one another about the things that matter most —more receptive and more mutually confident.

Truth Dawns and Songs of Gladness Spring Up

And what about those who have not yet found this joy? Well, we can be helpers of their joy by helping them to find it. And where is the joy to be found? Because if we know some of the roads that lead to it we can offer ourselves as helpful guides. Here, then, is a sentence which shall give us our first counsel. "Truth illuminates and gives joy." There is first the illumination and then the joy that is born of it. There is first the dawn and then the bird song. Truth shines about a soul and the soul begins to sing.

And that is the teaching of the word of God and the record of human life is crowded with witnesses. Some ray of divine truth falls upon a bewildered man and it is like a beam of light from a friendly cottage window falling upon a tired and belated traveler who has lost his way upon a moor. Truth is the parent of joy. Or some ray of a divine promise falls upon a broken-hearted widow, just like a shaft of sunlight bursting through the black clouds and rain and wind of a tempestuous twilight, and the silenced birds begin to sing again. The truth of the promise "makes the widow's heart to sing for joy."

Now, can we be the helpers of such joy by being ministers of this truth? Have we no experimental knowledge of God which we have gained in our own rugged ways of discipline? Are we in any sense the children of light? Then let us let our light so shine that the darkened mind of others shall be illumined, and the heavy, groping heart shall be made to sing for joy.

And here is a sentence from an old book of devotion which shall give us our second counsel. "Now I am sure all man's happiness is his holiness." Is that really so? Then the profound springs of joy are found in the fields of holiness. Purity is the hiding place of gladness, as impurity is the lurking place of woe. I recently stood near the workers who were building a new organ. It was Saturday night and they were tuning the pipes in readiness for the services next day. One of the notes gave a most discordant sound. The builder, who was standing near me, quietly remarked, "That sounds like dirt," and the pipe was examined and the dirt removed. The pipe was unclean and therefore the note was discordant. So that even in an organ purity is the parent of harmony, as in the soul holiness is the condition of joy.

The Clean Heart Alone May Be Truly Joyous

And now I remember the prayer of the psalmist in the fifty-first psalm, "Restore unto me the joy of thy salvation." But the prayer for the joy was preceded by a prayer for cleansing, "Create in me a clean heart." There must be the clean pipe before there can be the true music, and there must be a pure heart before there can be the Lord's joy. Well, now, can we be helpers of this kind of joy by leading people into a pure and holy life? Let us drop a great many of our little human prescriptions, our man-devised pledges and conventions, and let us lead these joyless people to the fountains that are open for sin and uncleanness.

And here is a further guiding sentence from the word of God: "And the song of the Lord began when the burnt offering began." The song began with the sacrifice. Joy is welded to consecration. When life became sacrificial, song awakened in the soul. This also is a part of the divine plan for the children of men. Song breaks out in service. Joy dies out when we are idle. We generate it as we serve. We begin to sing the song of the Lord when we spend ourselves in the labor of his kingdom.

Well, cannot we be helpers of that kind of joy by constraining people into His service? Let us induce them to take up some bit of work, the personal care of somebody else, or some service in the city, or some kind of interest among needy people far away. Let us get them to take up the yoke of the Lord Jesus Christ and draw their share of the world's burden, and so "enter into the joy of the Lord."

J. H. JOWETT.

India Silently Turning to Christ

BY HAROLD BEGBIE

The article presented herewith is a remarkable utterance by a remarkable writer. Mr. Begbie's introduction to the churches came through his "Twice Born Men" and "Souls in Action," which related extraordinary transformations of character under the power of the Spirit exercised through the ministrations of the Salvation Army. Later his attention was diverted to India, and he prepared a series of similar sketches of "miracles of grace" among the Indian people, published later under the title of "Other Sheep." These studies of conversion Mr. Begbie began from merely psychological curiosity, but his investigations have resulted in his own conversion to fervent loyalty to the gospel of Christ.

GREAT AND ENDURING THINGS are almost invariably silent. An earthquake or a thunderstorm compared with the quiet of nature in her labor of bringing apple blossoms or grass seeds to perfection is a trivial, transitory disturbance, however many cities fall, however many human creatures perish. A man's sneeze may startle a roomful of people, but persons a yard away will not hear the beat of his heart and the man next to him will not be aware that he is thinking.

It is probable that many of those matters which now absorb the public attention, to which the writers of leading articles in the newspapers devote a tremendous and diurnal energy, will seem of trivial account to our grandchildren. And it is equally probable that other matters of which the general public takes no cognizance, and to which the leaders of political parties and the masters of philosophical schools give no serious attention, will appear in the eyes of our posterity as the chief marks and the strongest glories of our too self-conscious age.

A Transformation Silent but Measureless

Among these silent, ignored and profoundly solemn things is the movement of the 300,000,000 people of India, out of immemorial sleep and turning their backs on an immemorial past, toward the mental frontiers of Europe. They are moved by two invisible powers. The energy of European materialism is one of these powers; the leaven of Christ is the other.

The mind of India is moving away from the superstitions, the customs, the traditions and the hypnotism of her long past. She is modernized and materialized; she is no longer a shivering child aghast at the dark, or a cowering slave afraid of a priestly master; she is half skeptical and half cynical; she laughs at her gods and reads Herbert Spencer; she washes off the sacred paint from her forehead and discusses the rival advantages of petrol and acetylene gas; she becomes a little excited by political rhetoric, taking the new word of freedom into her blood like a strong wine, and delighting in controversies which engaged the ponderous minds of the encyclopædists, or which now agitate Browning societies and local parliaments and students in university examinations.

She is young, heady and excitable, yet withal she is cynical and jaded—the fanatics among her millions are not numerous. It is a miracle in itself—the calm and wearied way in which India has awakened to the miracle of her sudden modernism. She is young, heady and excitable on occasion; her prevailing mood is one of half-interested amusement, of bland curiosity to know what will happen.

The Awesome Work of the Spirit of God

But there is the force of the leaven of Christ in this fermenting multitude of peoples. It is plain to every man who has eyes to see, that the Spirit of Christ, in a strange and most beautiful manner, is silently drawing India to the God of all truth. And this is not only the chief romance of India; it is the greatest and most stupendous romance of the whole world.

No church has conquered India; no missionary has left a Livingstonian mark upon her soul; no masterful theologian has convinced her that the Christian religion is superior to Hinduism, Mohammedanism or Buddhism. But the Spirit of Christ moving upon those dark and stagnant waters, in the simple kindness and loving charity of individual Christian people, has troubled the soul of India and moved it to a new wonder. For ages, for long ages, the religions of India have been hardening into a dreadful despotism. For ages and ages millions of people in India have been perfectly content to know themselves as "untouchables"—outcasts and pariahs. For ages and ages the whole vast population of Hindus has accepted, without wonder or mutiny, the exacting tyranny of the Brahman, paying tribute to the tyrant and submitting in every social detail to his scornful dominion. And in all these ages religion has seemed to them a hard and terrible way of escape from a doom infinitely more hard and infinitely more terrible—the doom of having to live.

And even while these millions scorned missionaries and derided the rivalry of Christian sects, their own religion was yielding to the influence of that new religion which they mocked. Without knowledge of the change, India began to contemplate religion as something kind, and existence as something possibly beautiful and desirable. India did not throw herself into the arms of the missionaries, but in her soul, in the soul of Hinduism, Buddhism and Mohammedanism, was the new thought of love which is the thought of Christ and the nature of God.

Other Religions Vainly Seek Their Own Reform

The religions of India are reforming themselves. The priests, who fear Christianity far more than they dislike the British Raj, are striving to make their religions reasonable and attractive. They see that if they lose the pariahs—70,000,000 of them—they will lose all. Their lives are at stake. Hinduism must be saved in order to save them. And their method is to copy, as closely as possible, that humanitarian aspect of Christianity which has so startled and so deeply moved the soul of their millions. They build hospitals, they go back to their oldest books to find a pure god and a merciful goddess.

It is impossible for India not to arrive at the Christian threshold. She has moved away from an aristocratic exclusiveness and from a tyranny of despotism toward fraternity, toward self-sacrifice, and toward love. Must not the end be Christ? The work has been begun by missionaries of every church and by noble-hearted, sweet-living and kindly laymen of every class and degree. All the planting and all the watering have been done by European Christians; but the increase is God's. It will be the increase of an Asian plant on an Asian soil, perhaps the deepest, most tender, most spiritual form of Christianity known among men.

This is the romance of India and the romance of the world. Look where you will, there is nothing on the earth at this hour so full of grandeur and so charged with poetry, so glad with hope, and so shining with illumination, as this new birth of the most religious people of the world in the Spirit of Christ.

Sharing the Memories of One's People

BY GERRIT VERKUYL

IN A CERTAIN CLASS on "pastoral theory and practice" the professor suggested a practical point out of his own experience that had so much sense and grace in it that I should like to publish it from the housetops. In his large pastorate, from which he was called to his present chair because of exceptional success, he made written note, including date and circumstances, of all the extraordinary events in the lives of his people. These notes he used later on to make his efforts count the very most in behalf of the people themselves.

To give an instance in point: On the fourteenth day of April the father of a family was suddenly taken away. That day will remain forever sacred in the minds of all the members of that household; that date is solemnized. No hilarity must mar the thought of father's death; no feastings or socials are in place. Outside intrusion, if out of harmony with the family spirit, will be strongly resented, no matter who the intruder may be. Now, suppose that on that day the pastor entered the home with his usual happy handshake and jovially asked the children to be present at the young people's social. It would be as innocently done as anything the pastor might have at heart, but it would disturb the family's sacred feelings. The pastor would afterward wonder for what reason a certain coolness had sprung up on the part of that friendly family. Yet the fault would be largely his. He could and should have remembered the day with them.

Suppose, on the other hand, that on that memorable day the family had received a letter of sympathy and consolation from their pastor, if only a few words; what a lasting effect it would have! Or suppose he should call on the family, when all were present, and have a word of prayer with them. Never through all the year was there an open door to bring those souls close to the heart of God as on that day. When the pastor leaves that home, the tie that binds their hearts with sacred love will have doubled in strength and beauty.

The joyful side is almost as great an opportunity. Birthdays and weddings have a family charm in which the pastor may humbly share. But the principle and its practice have been sufficiently stated to show their possible appropriation in the Sunday school work also. To keep that kind of cards on file will mean but little work for each individual teacher. To insert the extraordinary events of the pupils' lives will not require much energy. To glance at the cards of one class at the opening or the close of every week is not an imposing task. But the guidance it gives for effective work and the increase of power expended will be incalculable.

At times a little note will fully answer the purpose. At other times it may be possible to call at the pupil's home. That will mean more at a vital season than half a dozen common calls. Or, in quiet prayer, just previous to the lesson in the class, the teacher may mention the thought which is so close to the pupil's heart and thus help him to link his experiences with thoughts of the Eternal.

But, oh, it will mean unspeakably much to the pupil. For Christian sympathy is, after all, still rare in our quaint old world and our boys and girls are silently hungering for it.

China's "Reawakening" to Confucianism

BY CHARLES L. OGILVIE

SACRIFICES are being offered in the Confucian temples in Peking and Chufu, the latter being the burial place of the sage; large gatherings are being held, addressed by prominent Chinese scholars; a serious attempt is being made to insert a clause into the new constitution making Confucianism the state religion, and literature is being circulated to arouse public opinion.

There are those who will say, "I am astonished after having heard so much about religious liberty in China to know that there are those who want to take this backward step," but there is no cause for astonishment. We would rather be astonished if something like this did not occur. To think of a system with all the good points of Confucianism being pushed to the wall and kept there is unthinkable. It is bound to win its way back even though the place which it will hold in the future be somewhat lower than that occupied in the past. And as to its being a backward step, the Confucianist thinks just the opposite.

Ever since the Han dynasty Confucianism has been held in the highest esteem, things political, temporal and spiritual having been carried out on the basis laid down in the "Spring and Autumn Annals," which Confucius wrote for the purpose of helping the government. During the last dynasty, the one immediately preceding the republic, Confucianism fell into decay, largely due no doubt to the fact that memorials contained more quotations for the edicts of previous emperors than from the annals. To counteract this tendency the empress dowager, of Boxer memory, conceived the idea of elevating Confucius, by the easy Chinese method, to the rank of a god, thus completing the trinity, heaven, earth and man.

Two of the Literati Kotowing to Confucius Outside Temple at Peking

The action of the empress dowager was not wholly satisfactory, especially to the progressives, and as a result a warm controversy was aroused on the question as to whether the classics should be retained in the schools, culminating in a victory for the progressives and the expulsion of the sacred books from the curriculum. This was a radical step, but withal a perfectly natural one as a reaction against the life-long servitude of the Chinese to the classics. But as is the case in all countries where one extreme creates another, things gradually settled down to a more normal condition after the heat of the struggle. Now that the revolution is past, the people are beginning to take an inventory, and under the influence of such scholars as Kang Yu Wei and Liang Chi Chiao, they are commencing to realize the value of much that had for the moment been discarded. They also recognize to some extent at least that a suit of western clothes, a tall hat and a cane do not necessarily fit a man who lives in China to perform his duties as a citizen of the republic.

This dissatisfaction with the new ways, nourished by prejudice, has blossomed out into the forming of a Confucian society for the purpose of resurrecting the doctrines of the great teacher and making them the basis of a religion.

The proposal is destined to have more success along educational lines than along religious lines. The progress of the Confucian society in a religious way cannot be described as glorious. The first gathering held in the Confucian temple in Peking on September 3 was an apparent success. Sacrifices were offered to Confucius and gifts were presented. The worshipers kotowed both inside and outside the temple. The official representative of Yuan Shih Kai was present in addition to many other noted scholars. Impressive addresses as to the value of the classics were made by influential people and the ceremonies were conducted in a dignified and satisfactory manner. But when Confucius's birthday arrived on the 24th of September and a larger effort was put forth to have a three days' festival, the results were not as pleasing as had been anticipated. The noted guests were conspicuous by their absence; the crowd also seemed to have other business; and as for the worshipers, they were few and far between. Those who had the matter in charge tried to stimulate visitors to kotow, but there was not much "ginger" in the response.

Portion of Confucian Temple at Peking

In a circular which has been quite widely circulated, the following arguments have been used: "We who have culture and know what is right ought to do this," i. e., worship Confucius. "God used Confucius as a sounding-board to deliver his message." "The books of Confucius have lasted to the present day and cannot be wiped out." "Confucian doctrines should be believed by all because he is the greatest teacher in the world." "At the present time Christianity is making great progress. It has come from the West and has the strength of a lion. But this strength is due to the fact that powerful nations are behind it. This sort of thing, however, cannot last for centuries." "The Mohammedans came to China many centuries ago, but now they amount to nothing. Christianity has only lately come to China, but in a short time it will also go." "He who doesn't honor Confucius is the same as he who doesn't honor his father and mother, so I, Yang [the author of the circular], ought to beat the large bell to cause all the people who are sleeping to arise and praise Confucius."

While the foregoing is extreme and is begotten either of ignorance or malice, the net result of the present agitation will undoubtedly be some sort of a return to the teachings of Confucius. The candle of Buddhism is flickering and its light is destined to become less and less conspicuous; the lamp of Islam still throws out its unitarian beam, but that beam is cold; the arc light of Confucianism is still able to throw light on the path of virtue, but in the presence of the rising sun of Christianity, no one feels attracted to the lesser lights. They come into contact with their source, are revived, strengthened and purified, but only to be lost in the ever-widening glory of the ascending sun.

Odd Bits of Humor

IN GREECE, TURKEY and AUSTRIA with

BY MARGARET C. ANDERSON

ROBERT HICHENS is a novelist; therefore he knows how to write a travel book. Jules Guerin is an artist; therefore he knows how to "see" a country. The combination is one that has been worked with great success during the last three or four years, but in a way this volume (THE NEAR EAST, Century Company, New York; $6 net) is the most interesting of any so far produced by the partnership with the possible exception of "The Holy Land."

It takes that interest chiefly from the fact that it is the record of the impact of a region "very delicate, very pure, very sensitive, very individual, free from the Eastern drowsiness, from the heavy eastern perfume" upon a mind saturated with the fierce and heavy charm of the Eastern desert.

When one comes suddenly upon Mr. Guerin's painting of the Parthenon at Athens—which looks as though it had been sensed on some ineffable white night of early spring—he feels that no harmonies of words could give him such a pull at the throat. But when Mr. Hichens supplements the picture with the kind of words a poet knows how to choose—"All Athens lies beneath you, pale, almost white, with hints of mauve and yellow, gray and brown. . . . An exquisite, vital pastoral. . . . Myrtle-covered shores and bays of violet and turquoise . . . Preserving those eternal dew-drops which still make it the land of the early morning"—well, one realizes the function of language and why we need it even in the presence of an adequately pictorial art. We usually don't see all there is to be seen until we're told about it. Words raised to the realm of color, color raised to the power of words—here are two supplementary arts which Mr. Hichens and Mr. Guerin have made supremely articulate.

But Greece doesn't come first in their itinerary. On the way they visit many of the picturesque towns of Dalmatia—Zara, Spalato, Trau, Ragusa, Cattaro, Castelnuovo, Sebenico — and in all of them Mr. Hichens strolls about registering impressions, much in manner of his artist companion. For these are impressionistic travels; their "technique" is of the same school as Mr. Guerin's; they are no more like the average collection of facts and dates and guidebook information than Mr. Guerin is like Raphael.

Coming along the coast of Dalmatia one sees pale hills backed by ghostly gray mountains—"flesh color and steel almost cruelly blended." But on approaching Zara a warmth creeps into the air and the little town lies smiling on a happy green land. "Against the somber grays and browns of facades, set in the deep shadows of the paved alleys which are Zara's streets, move brilliant colors, scarlet and silver, blue and crimson and silver." (Mr. Hichens's sense of color leads him often into a vividness of grouping that reminds one of the "blue and purple and scarlet and fine linen" of the Israelites' tabernacle.)

Copyright, 1913, Century Co., N.Y. Gate Leading to Old Seraglio, Constantinople

"But who that remembers Zara," he goes on, "remembers not Zara's bells? Bells ringing in hidden places behind the palaces; bells calling across strange gardens lifted high on mighty walls; bells whispering among pines and murmuring across green depths of glasslike water; bells chiming above the yellowing vines on tiny islands!" Many other interesting towns of the country are visited with the same descriptive care.

And now we come to the most illuminating section of the group—the descent upon Greece.

As is well known, Mr. Hichens has made himself interpreter of Egypt, particularly of the Nile region and the great Sahara. Now imagine the emotional reaction, upon a man who has been obsessed with the strange beauty of solitary Arabs moving in the vast sands, of a country like Greece in late summer.

His first impressions are of intellectual freshness, of "radiance purged of fierceness"; he writes that nature seems purged of all excesses, since nature is never theatrical in Greece; that there is no suggestion of that oppressive beauty that weighs upon the heart, none of the tremendous, spectacular release of the desert—a savage tearing away of bonds—but some quality of white coolness brightened with flowers and surrounded by purple seas, to all of which his instinct urges him to apply "that soft word 'loveliness.'" And he makes this very definite statement of comparison: "No memory of the gigantic ruins of Egypt, however familiarly known, can live in the mind, can make even the puniest fight for existence before this Doric front of Pentelic marble [the Parthenon], simple, even plain, but still in its devastation supreme."

Characteristic descriptions of the Acropolis follow, and then a consideration of Athens. The modern city is a delightful place to live in, Mr. Hichens thinks. "Nobody in it looks rich—that dreadful look!—and scarcely anybody looks poor." Everybody is democratic, nobody talks about rank, and all Athenians behave like gentlemen. It's something of a surprise to discover that they're not fond of hard exercise, and that they abandon their cool watering places for the hot city according to the dictates of fashion. When "the season is over" everybody troops back to Athens and swelters instead of remaining at Phalerum or the baths near Corinth, whose limpid waters seem infinitely preferable to dusty pavements and stifling heat.

Another surprise consists in discovering Mr. Hichens's choice of the pine as the representative Greek tree. The silver green olive tree, named by the guidebooks, is abundantly present; but to him the pines, more yellow than green, form the mass of color that dominates the landscape. In summing up his impressions of the Greek atmosphere the author says that "wildness and calm seem woven together, a warm and almost caressing wildness with a calm that is full of romance. There the wilderness is indeed a haven to long after, and there the solitudes call you as if with the voices of friends."

Delphi and Olympia are visited next and then the two travelers go on to Constantinople, which is described as beautiful and hateful, fascinating and repellent. No other city that he has seen, Mr. Hichens confesses, has so confused and distressed him. These chapters are worth reading.

"The Near East" is a volume to delight lovers of fine book making. It is, of course, one of the year's most significant travel studies and besides its wonderful Guerin paintings there is a collection of exceedingly interesting photographs.

Florence Nightingale in Greece

In the new "Life of Florence Nightingale," by Sir Edward Cook (published by the Macmillan Company, New York), the biographer tells of the famous war nurse's first visit to Athens in 1850. She and her friends took a house in Eucharis street and Florence slept in the library, "which opens on to a terrace looking upon the back of the Acropolis." Of the Parthenon by moonlight she wrote that it was "impossible that earth or heaven could produce anything more beautiful." In another letter it was characteristic of the philosophical bent of her mind that she sought to refer the charm of scenery to some general law:

"How lovely the scenery is would be difficult to describe, and why it is so lovely. I begin to think that it is the proportion, and that there must be proportion in the things of nature as of art. In the valleys of Switzerland the height is too great for the width, and it looks like a bottle. In the valleys of Egypt the width is too great for the height, and it looks like a tray. For this reason clouds are provided in Switzerland and Scotland; the height would have been intolerably out of proportion unless it were covered in at the top. For this reason clear sky is in Egypt, or you would feel in a shelf. But here, where the sky is meant, they say, to be perpetual (though I cannot say I have seen much of it since I came), the proportion observed has been perfect, the exact curve is always there, the exact slope which we want; and if a line were to change its place, you feel the effect would be spoilt. You feel towards it as to an architectural building. I believe that in this lies the great peculiarity of the Athenian views."

Sir Edward records that Miss Nightingale had little taste for the topographical research and nice distinctions between masters of sculpture which absorb the interest of many modern travelers and students. "She was interested in broader speculations. The soul of a people, as expressed in their art, was the object to which she directed her observation and around which she loved to let her imagination play. In her notebooks and letters she discusses the spiritual conceptions embodied in the worship of the several Greek gods; she traces the symbols of Greek mythology to their sources in Greek scenery; she pictures the genius of Æschylus (her favorite tragedian, preferred by her even to Shakespeare), or of Sophocles developing in relation to local conditions and surroundings. Of the statues, the pensive beauty of the sepulchral bas-reliefs most arrested her attention; and in architecture she loved most the Doric for its severity, its simplicity, its perfection of proportion, its image of the republican ideal."

Miss Nightingale herself writes: "Only a republican could have conceived it, and it is sin for any other government to imitate it. . . . I do love the old Doric as if it was a person. Then comes the Ionic, light and elegant and airy, it is true, like the Attic wit, but somewhat luscious to the taste, it soon palls; the fluting is too labored, too semicircular, like the people sitting in a semicircle to hear the wit of Aristophanes; it does not look as if it belonged to the column; and that ridge between the flutes, what is it doing there? It looks like the interval while the next interlocutor is thinking of a repartee. . . . Give me the Ionic to amuse me, but the Doric to interest me. . . . But look at the workmanship of these things. How mathematically exact it is—the very poetry of number."

Christmas Days in the Isles of Delight

A Young New England Kindergartner's Experience in Hawaii

BY FRANCES BENT DILLINGHAM

IT WAS CHRISTMAS DAY; the sun shone golden across the green lawn and on the swaying palms which Elizabeth viewed dismally through the long French windows of the rather dingy boarding house. On the breakfast table was an ugly vase redeemed by the mass of purple bougainvillæa blossoms which the Chinese boy had picked from the brilliant vine in the garden; the odor of lilies floated through the blinds of the other long window.

"Every prospect pleases," Elizabeth repeated half-ruefully to herself as she pushed away the great golden slice of papaia.

"You don't know what you miss, not eating papaia." Her neighbor talked so fast that her chin quivered in her efforts.

"Oh, I like it well enough. It tastes like jasmine and orange blossoms; only—I'm not hungry."

"Tel'phone," said the Chinese boy at her elbow.

It was like a call from another world and Elizabeth rose blithely. Her voice through the telephone was untouched by homesickness.

"Yes, indeed, delighted. Thank you so much; so good of you. Oh, I can get there all right. No, I don't—so glad you told me. I can find it—yes—yes—thank you. Oh, merry Christmas!" but the greeting was lost.

Elizabeth paused a moment at the hall door and looked out at the feathery algeroba tree and at another whose name she did not know, ablaze with scarlet blossoms; the air was balmy, and from the mountains came a freshening breeze. A small Japanese woman passed, dressed in her soft-colored kimono and with her graceful shuffling gait; a Chinaman balancing a pole laden at both ends trotted by. Elizabeth saw again a village street winding between snow-covered walls, the house at the head of the hill, a shade less white than the snow and the face at the window. Ah, the faces that would never see hers again! They had gone on a longer journey than hers, else she would never have left the chill, barren but ever-dear country for the opulence of a land unknown save for the accounts of daring friends who from time to time had invaded the tropics. She was a kindergartner in Honolulu, eager to be free from sad memories and to see a world which, outwardly at least, showed itself fair.

BUT from a village with the advantage—and disadvantage—of being known all one's life to a city where one has letters of introduction to only one family is a far span, and Elizabeth felt her loneliness sorely. Last Christmas her mother had invited the minister and his large family to dinner; this year Elizabeth was alone in Honolulu. "Merry Christmas!" she called haltingly and unheard after the Japanese woman.

At the table she choked over the papaia, trying to regain her self-control; meantime her neighbor was running on:

"Did you say you were going to teach? There's only three things girls come out here for—to get married, for the trip, or to teach."

"Yes, I'm a kindergartner. What is the malihini Christmas tree?"

"Oh, it's a tree that the malihinis once gave to the children of Honolulu, and the people have kept it up ever since, and they all come into the yard of the government building and get presents and it rains and they all get wet——"

The words jumbling, she paused for breath and Elizabeth asked: "What is a malihini?"

"Of course it doesn't always rain, but sometimes it does—it did last year. A malihini is a new one—native word for people who are strangers or who have just come—you're one. Well, I must go," and she strolled away.

Elizabeth's room was not small, but there was about it a suggestion of dinginess combined with opulence; at home it was precisely the other way — spotlessness with a meager, barren look. When Elizabeth was dressed in her simple best, her spirits rose; it is something to be young and healthy and have it Christmas. She told herself in the mirror:

"You wanted to come, you decided to come, you said you couldn't stay at home. You knew you'd be homesick, but you're not going to be on Christmas. You mustn't expect people to realize. You must make others happy—if you get the chance. If the Wrights don't invite you to dinner, never mind. You won't starve. Christmas dinner in a boarding house may not sound festive, but it may taste good. You mustn't expect an invitation, though you know you do. Hope dies hard in the human breast," and she laughed.

The conductor of the car was very friendly and told her where to get off for the malihini Christmas tree. The gray government building stood in the wide yard, now thronged with automobiles, but leaving a wide space around the tall green tree which showed gayly against a sky of summer blue. The Wrights had evidently not come, so Elizabeth strolled over to the children waiting beyond the barrier for the signal of admittance into the promised land. Almost all the eyes that looked into her blue ones of New England were dark; there were the soft, languorous ones of the Hawaiian, the almond-shaped ones of the Japanese, the beady of the Chinese.

ONE pair especially attracted her attention—the boy, with his coarse black hair pasted moistly to his head, wore a faded blue shirt, a frayed yellow necktie and brown trousers much too long on the short legs which projected stockingless below, ending in a rusty pair of russet shoes; but the little girl by his side was a picture in her gay kimono and sandaled feet with her hair banged across her forehead.

"You dear little doll!" cried Elizabeth. "Are you going to the Christmas tree?"

Into the solemn face came no evidence of emotion, but the small boy answered for her:

"He no Clistmas tlee. He no ticket."

"Oh, I thought it was a little girl."

"Yes, he little girl, no ticket, me no ticket, no can."

To the tables heaped with toys went Elizabeth and spoke to a pleasant-faced young man.

"There are two little Japanese who have no tickets."

"They should have got them before; they were given out at the missions——" The young man was sorting the trumpets and did not at once look up; when he saw Elizabeth's eager face he began to search his pockets. "I do believe I have one somewhere."

"But there are two."

"I have only one—but—I tell you—do you suppose you could help? So many people have disappointed us at the last moment. Then you could have one of the children come around and when he—or she—gets here you could give him an extra present—you'd know him all right, wouldn't you?"

"Oh, yes, indeed, of course. I should be delighted. I'll tell him."

Expectation had held her small Japanese friends glued to the spot in which she had left them. Elizabeth explained:

"I could get only one ticket, but you tell your little sister to wait somewhere and when you come around I will give you a doll for her. You understand? Here is your ticket."

He touched his forehead in sign of the Japanese "thank you," and took the ticket gravely.

"Now, if you were a street gamin in New York," commented Elizabeth, looking into his unblinking eyes, "you would probably not say 'Thank you,' you would snatch the ticket out of my hands, but you would look perfectly delighted and you would grin and say something—perhaps 'Gee!'"

As if in answer, he did condescend to smile, but more apparently from outward politeness than from inward joy—a slit of white teeth showed across the yellow of his face.

"It's almost time for the procession to commence; you'll be sure to be there, won't you?" called Elizabeth as she hurried away.

As she turned she ran directly into the Wrights—Mr. and Mrs. Wright and a young woman who had come down on the steamer with her. Elizabeth thought she remembered the newcomer unpleasantly, though she could hardly tell why; perhaps it was the general misery attendant on the voyage down, which had prejudiced her against many; perhaps it was the detached air of haughty indifference which the young woman carried about with her. But as all this flashed through her mind, she noticed the elaborate gown and the hat, heavily loaded with ostrich plumes, which the young woman, acknowledging the introduction, swept toward her with grand indifference. It gave Elizabeth the feeling that the finery and the manner were put on to impress somebody—perhaps her humble self.

She was proud to say, "I have promised to help."

As she hurried away Mr. Wright's kindly eyes followed her: "Now, that's a nice, sensible girl."

ELIZABETH took her place behind a table beside a large, amiable woman and began to dole out dolls to shy-faced little girls with the mother instinct shining from the eyes of all nations.

"Oh, here you are, Yamanaka," for well to the fore was her protege, supplied with every possible toy save a doll. His eyes were certainly dancing now, while the white of his teeth was very plainly visible.

"Here is your doll; take it to your little sister."

His arms were already full, but he managed the doll successfully, then passed on. As he went a cloud passed over the sun and the thing that had been foretold happened. It began to rain, absolutely without warning to Elizabeth; the heavens opened, the rains came, the floods descended. She thought of her gown and hat—"poor things, but my own," she murmured in the intervals of handing out red-gowned dolls whose colors came off in her hands most unpleasantly, and of trying to keep the wet tissue paper around the oranges.

"Oh, don't hug that doll!" she cried to the small, white-starched Hawaiian who clutched her gift to her breast, indifferent to the stains of red dye dripping from the doll's frock.

The amiable but evidently selfish woman next to Elizabeth said: "I really must run. I have no umbrella and every drop of rain spots this hat. I was a goose to wear it—now you were so sensible. Good-by."

Elizabeth could not even stop to look after her, the children were coming so fast; it was a trifle unpleasant to feel the water trickling down the back of her neck—suddenly it stopped!

A small voice said, "'Scuse, please!"

She turned. There stood her little Japanese holding an umbrella over her head.

"Lady no wet," he smiled.

"Thank you, thank you!" she cried, turning again to her dolls, for the procession was marching boldly into the heart of the rain, inspired by the common hope of getting something. Yet the small soldiers were many of them weeping, some gently, others vociferously. Comfort as well as dolls must be dispensed and it was some time before Elizabeth looked around; then she saw that by some necromancy the umbrella had been transferred from the Japanese to the young man who had asked her help.

"You deserve assistance; you are a heroine to brave these elements."

Elizabeth laughed. "The color of my garments is not so easily affected by the rain as the dolls'." She held out her red and blue streaked hands. "But I am sure you ought not to hold that umbrella; I can manage."

"No, no," he insisted, but Elizabeth saw somebody signaling to him and insisted on taking the umbrella herself.

As she turned toward the table, umbrella in one hand and the other endeavoring to manipulate the dolls, she noticed among those just supplied, who had already moved on, a familiar back. She called "Yamanaka!" It happened to be the only Japanese name she knew.

He turned and looked at her. His arms were full as before—doll, orange, trumpet!

Smiling, he shook his head. "Me no Yamanaka, me Ishi. Little sister, he want nudder doll."

He marched solemnly on, assisted by the pressure behind, and Elizabeth was too much engaged in waiting on her more honest constituency to argue further with him. She caught sight of two women running madly across the yard to the shelter of the capitol porch; they were Mrs. Wright and her young friend—but such a young friend! The ostrich feathers hung so wet and bedraggled that any respectable ostrich would have hidden his head in the sand at sight of them; the dye had evidently come out of her veil, for the color on lips and cheeks was in blotches. Her blouse clung to her shoulders and there was a wide border of mud on the edge of her skirt. As for Mrs. Wright, her hat was awry, her veil clung damply to her lips, her once smooth crimps neatly pressed down, were now in full measure running over and streamed down her creeks like brown threads.

Elizabeth waved her umbrella at them; it was all she could do—she had not seen them in time to go to their assistance. The young woman looked at Elizabeth sharply, then said something to Mrs. Wright and they gave her the coldest of bows—even Mrs. Wright! Elizabeth's heart sank down into her damp shoes. What had she done? At home she might have laughed at such a contretemps, but here the Wrights seemed the one straw to save her from drowning in a sea of loneliness. Meantime there were those whom neither slights could crush nor water drown; the children were still clamoring for gifts—to be sure, the tissue paper was a delusion, the dolls blighted as to complexions and clothes, the new shoes much the worse for puddles and the best dresses starchless and muddy; tears of regret were in longing eyes, but they were longing still.

"YOU HAVE certainly stood by well," said a voice at her side, "but really you should be excused now. Wouldn't you like to go up on the lanai——"

"Lanai?" queried Elizabeth.

"Yes, veranda, porch, piazza. Then you can look down and see the sights."

Elizabeth thought of Mrs. Wright. "Oh, thank you," she said.

As she walked away she heard a louder wail than usual from the weeping children. She turned her head, and there in the procession stood her little Japanese friend, holding by the hand "he," who was wailing with monotonous insistence while the rain trickled off the end of her round nose and her soaked kimono clung to her small figure. Elizabeth stopped short.

"For pity's sake! If there isn't that little Ishi going around for the third time. How do you suppose he ever manages?"

"Well, he evidently managed this time by waiting till you were out of the way."

"But the tickets!"

"He was probably lying cheerfully when he told you he had none; he was or rather has been evidently the proud possessor of three."

"Oh, I think that is dreadful. Do they really lie that way?"

"Some do. The first thing we try to teach children is to tell the truth."

She caught sight of Mrs. Wright and her friend about to make a dash across the yard to the automobile. Elizabeth took the umbrella out of the young man's hand as they were going up the steps of the capitol. "Will you excuse me?" she said hastily as she extended her protection toward the two coming down the steps. Mrs. Wright never looked at her, but the young woman grabbed the umbrella promptly and rudely and made off with it after a hurried "Thank you."

Elizabeth stood dumfounded on the steps until the young man suggested shelter. When they reached a dry spot she turned toward him:

"What do you suppose is the matter? They are the only people I know here and I thought they were my friends."

"Well, I don't think it is the company you keep, for I know the Wrights and they really are fine. There must be some misunderstanding. I should say the young lady looked a trifle snippy. I beg pardon—if she is a friend——"

"Oh, no, she's the one that isn't——" Then she turned toward him with sudden thought. "But I can't let them run off with my umbrella. I must get it; it isn't mine. You see Ishi lent it to me. Does this climate take away one's wits, because—there, they're cranking up!"

Off she started in the rain. The young man waited to borrow an umbrella from a willing but surprised friend, then started after her, calling:

"Wait—please wait just a moment." But Elizabeth ran on quite unconscious of the hurrying figure wildly waving an umbrella. He reached her just as she reached the automobile. She began pantingly while he bowed to Mr. and Mrs. Wright and held the umbrella, useful at last, over her reckless head.

"I beg pardon, but I must ask for that umbrella I lent you. You see, it isn't mine——"

"May I ask whose it is?" The voice of the young woman was icily distant.

"It belongs to a little Japanese friend of mine, Ishi; and I can't

THE HOME COUNCIL

"And This Is the Way to Keep House"

BY GOLDIE ROBERTSON FUNK

I HAVE LEARNED to keep house so largely by process of elimination that what is left to do is only enough to keep us all in good health and good temper. Several years ago I determined to do without a maid. The maid gone I felt foot loose to institute my reforms.

Beginning with the attic and ending with the basement, I sorted out every article we didn't actually use, and sent a wagonload of junk to a rummage sale and another to the city dump. Drawers and closets were combed clean, and a great heap of wornout clothing I cut up into dish, cleaning, stove and mop rags and holders.

Hall, parlor, living room, dining room, kitchen, supply closet, bedrooms and basement were denuded of pieces of bric-a-brac, ornaments, meaningless pictures and other things stored away because they might come in handy sometime. The dining room plate rail alone witnessed the final washing and putting away of twenty plates, twelve pitchers, six fancy mugs and thirty-two cups. The bedroom walls were bared of pictures, photographs, banners and cobwebs, the beds shorn of lace spread and valance and decorative bolster. We shook, sunned and folded these away for "occasions." All our bedrooms are as fresh and beautifully bare as hospital rooms, and all the drapery of the guest chamber is folded away in the dresser drawers of the room. Between guests the room is furnished simply, with sun and air rampant.

With this burden of things out of the way I began my reform housekeeping. The dear grandmother has her big room and a closet with plenty of hooks, hangers and shelves. Her belongings are never out of place. My husband is very methodical by nature, and always puts things back into their proper place. Furthermore, he waits on himself—a practice I did not interfere with after we were married, and for which I frequently thank his mother.

Simplified Clothing Brings Simplified Washings, as Part of the "System"

The washing and ironing used to stagger us till I put the two children, now 7 and 5, into blue chambray rompers. They never wear anything else when they are at home. The result is that the washing is only half what it was before, and most of it is sent to the laundry, flat pieces ironed, 20 cents a dozen, and starched pieces 35 cents a dozen "rough dry." Outing gowns, underwear and stockings we do at home, folding smooth and putting away without ironing. I can afford to send the washing out because I mend so carefully and save so persistently in other ways.

We never bake cakes or pies, or make doughnuts or fancy desserts. Instead, we practice variations on bread dough, combining with it nuts, dates or raisins, and I buy an occasional home made cake at a food sale. We can a great deal of fruit and serve it "au naturel."

I buy turnips, parsnips, carrots and potatoes by the sack, and before they are put into the bins they are emptied into the kitchen sink and scrubbed clean with a brush. This is quite a little task, but it means eventually a great saving of time and muss.

Twice a year a good dressmaker comes to the house for a few days to make and "make over." I am particular to have the machine oiled, bobbins filled, my needle and thread boxes fully supplied, and all to-be-made-over things ripped and pressed.

Every morning all of us except grandma have a race to see who will get dressed first. Each opens his own bed. Father makes range and living room fires and fills teakettles. I comb daughter; she combs little brother, sets table and puts up chairs; he fills woodbox bit by bit; I make coffee and toast and dish up cereal or eggs; daughter arranges fruit and carries everything to the table while I put cereal to cook for next morning.

As each is excused from the table he puts his own chair back and carries out his own dishes. Daughter finishes the clearing off and leaves the table set with silver and napkins for lunch. The children clean their teeth, grandma washes dishes, while I prepare everything for dinner at night. Son brings up vegetables from bins; daughter, under my supervision, makes a pudding for lunch, using any left-over cereal, dinner left-over or scraps of bread suitable for the purpose. Even 7-year-old fingers can become quite skillful if properly directed. I see to the cooking of it, because she now goes to school. I rub off the range and wipe the kitchen floor. We never sweep inside the house.

Twice a week I wipe living room and hall floors with dustless mop, and son sweeps the front porch and walk with his little broom. My husband lunches downtown. In this morning interim son plays, while grandma and I read, write or mend. The moment we see a little red hat coming down the street I heat up a heartening lunch for grandma and my little workers, adding a dish of daughter's pudding; son carries it, tray by tray, to the table. The children rinse our lunch dishes and pile them in the dishpan, where they stand till we start dinner. Son plays and grandma and I are once more at leisure till we again see that little red hat come bobbing up the street. That signals that it's time for son and me to make our beds. Then we dress while daughter makes hers and then we all go for a walk or to market or for a little friendly visit till it's time to come home and start dinner.

"Working a Race" in Morning Brings Pleasure in Afternoon

Saturday morning, while the risen-over-night bread is rising in the pans, and Sunday's roast or meat loaf is in the oven for the first half of its cooking, and I am wiping picture tops, piano, mantel and halltree, the children roll and carry to the back yard every rug except the two large ones. I hang the rugs over the line, daughter wipes all the chairs, son wipes all the windows and baseboards. Each has his own dustless duster and dustless mop. Son wipes the hall floor and daughter the parlor floor while I use a wet mop on living and dining room floors. I use vacuum cleaner on the two large rugs, while the children carry in and lay the small ones. We are "working a race" now, for we always have something "on" for Saturday afternoon. No matter whether it rains or shines or snows we dress accordingly and walk somewhere unfailingly in this wonderful western country. That walk is an important part of my "system."

Each child has his own hooks, hangers, shelves and drawers within reach of small hands and arms, and is required to keep them in perfect order. A few drops of perfume shaken into a spick-and-span drawer as a reward of merit has been a great inspiration to tidiness! The shelves and drawers in the living room closet belong to them exclusively. Once a week they sort over their toys and keepsakes, each putting his own share in order and burning what he no longer cares for or, if it is still usable, putting it in "the poor box" in which we stow away things for the comfort or happiness of those less fortunate than ourselves.

Each article in each room has its own particular place. No one ever says, "Where is this or that?"—it's always where it belongs.

I like my "system." It saves my time, my strength—and my disposition. Try it.

Verses Old and New

CHRISTMAS DAY

I think I might be weary of this day
  That comes inevitably every year,
The same when I was young and strong and gay,
  The same when I am old and growing sear—
I should grow weary of it every year
  But that thou comest to me every day.

I shall grow weary if thou every day
  But come to me, Lord of eternal life;
I shall grow weary thus to watch and pray,
  Forever out of labor into strife;
Take everlasting house with me, my Life,
  And I shall be newborn this Christmas Day.

Thou art the eternal Son, and born no day,
  But ever he the Father, thou the Son;
I am his child, but being born alway—
  How long, O Lord, how long till it be done?
Be thou from endless years to years the Son—
  And I thy brother, newborn every day.

Instead of a Tree

For the mother who dreads the work of preparing a Christmas tree, or who is apprehensive of fire disaster because of it, come suggestions from various sources for original and unique ways of distributing Santa Claus' burden.

One family forms on Christmas morning into a procession, the smallest first, the tallest bringing up the rear, and marches by whatever route the leader chooses to the room where the stockings hang. Here the stockings are emptied by their owners, one at a time according to the order of the procession, the others being interested spectators till their turn comes.

Another suggestion comes from a mother who decorates the mantel and grate with tinsel, holly and evergreen and then piles the gifts helter skelter in the unused fireplace, where the children firmly believe they have been thrown by Santa himself. Or the fireplace may be used only for gifts too large for the stockings, which may be hung among the evergreen.

Then there's the plan of hiding the gifts. This is done on Christmas eve, the parcels being tucked away in all the curious hiding places ingenuity can devise. On Christmas morning after breakfast the hunt begins simultaneously. A paper must first be tacked up in a conspicuous place, bearing the name of the recipients, and opposite these each must mark the number of packages he or she has hidden for the different persons. This will enable the searchers to know when they have found all their presents. Every package when hidden must bear the name of the recipient, of course. When a present is found by someone not its rightful owner it must be slipped back into its place without "telling." When all the gifts have been gathered they are brought to the dining room table for a general opening. A variation of this gift gathering is the presentation of a large pasteboard box bearing a number for each member of the family. When the bearer finds a package with his number on it, it goes into his box.

A writer in The Mother's Magazine tells of a Christmas morning on which each of her family found at his place at the breakfast table a little basket containing a few candies. Red ribbons tied to the handles of this basket reached up to the chandelier, and from there extended through the doorways of the room and diseappeared. After a lively chase after breakfast the ribbons were traced to little baskets of fruits, nuts, and candies and from these finally led to a large clothes basket in the library decorated with evergreen and holly and containing a bulky package for each, drawn out by his individual ribbon.

A Christmas pole on the plan of a May pole is pretty for a children's party. Wind with red and green ribbons and at the top tie a great bunch of evergreen and holly, hanging just beneath a ribbon-tied package for each child. When the pole is unwound a snip of the scissors will loosen the gifts, each of which will slide down its own special ribbon into the little waiting hands below.

YOUNG AMERICA

A Little Maid of Bethlehem

BY REBECCA DEMING MOORE

LITTLE TABITHA rubs her eyes and stretches. "Come, hasten, little one," her mother calls; "roll up your bed, for a new day is here." Tabitha scrambles to her feet and, picking up her bed, which is nothing but a hard mattress three or four inches thick, tucks it away out of sight in a recess in the wall.

It takes Tabitha but a few seconds to dress, for she wears just one garment, an odd frock made all in one piece, with an opening at the top for her head and two more at the sides for her arms. She doesn't wash her face at all. Water is so very precious in that hot, dry land where Tabitha lives that her mother does not think it necessary for little girls to waste it for bathing in the morning.

But although Tabitha is not in the least troubled by her unwashed face, she would not consider herself dressed for the day if there were not fastened somewhere in her hair a certain bright blue bead. Tabitha's parents, although they are more intelligent than many of the people of Palestine, are ignorant enough to believe that a little blue bead will keep its wearer out of danger. Her mother has one on the veil with which she covers her face on her trips to the near-by town. There is also a bead woven into Tabitha's father's saddlebags to protect him from the attacks of robbers. Even the baby brother who lies asleep close by, his little body wound tightly with yards and yards of cotton bands, wears a blue bead suspended from a string around his neck.

"Run to the well, little daughter," bids Tabitha's mother as she thrusts a tall earthen jar into her little girl's hands, "and take care that you meet no one who is about to start on a journey." Should Tabitha, so her mother believes, meet a traveler while her water jar is still empty, misfortune would fall upon the whole family unless she at once broke the vessel in pieces. Tabitha soon comes back safely, however, with the jar filled to the top from their well near by.

Not a word does her mother say about setting the table for breakfast, for two very good reasons. In the first place, there isn't such a thing as a table in Tabitha's home, and in the second place, there is no breakfast. The family would think it a great trouble to prepare a regular meal in the morning. Tabitha helps herself to a few dried figs from one of the earthen bins which are arranged along the sides of the family living room. Her brother Thaddeus snatches a handful of raisins from another bin, and her father goes off to his work in the fields with only a draught of water or a few olives by way of a breakfast.

Even without the breakfast to prepare, this little maid of Bethlehem is far from idle. To be sure, there is no dusting to do, for the house has no furniture. Grass mats are used instead of chairs and the row of bins in which the family supplies are kept is the only other furniture. Tabitha's home has really but one room. One part of this room, about three-quarters of the whole, is higher than the rest. In the lower half live the animals of the family, the goats and the two donkeys which Tabitha's father harnesses to the plow after the heavy rains of October have soaked the soil baked hard by the hot Syrian sunshine. There is only one little window, high up in the wall, in this strange house, but the family do not mind the lack of light and air, for they spend most of their time out of doors except during the heavy rains. There is a trough or manger in the upper room. Here, while she goes about her daily work, Tabitha's mother lays the baby.

"Fetch the corn, little daughter," her mother calls, and Tabitha runs to one of the large earthen bins to get a supply for the day's grinding. In one corner of the room is the mill, which is made of two large, flat, heavy stones about eighteen inches across. The lower one has an upright pin fastened in the center. In the center of the upper stone is drilled a hole which slips over the pin in the other stone. There is a handle fastened to the edge of the upper stone. Tabitha's mother pours a handful of corn into the hole in the center of the upper stone; then she turns the stone quickly around and around, until the corn, in the form of flour, begins to work its way out from between the two stones. She has spread a cloth under the mill before beginning the grinding that none of the flour be lost. Tabitha kneels on the floor in the same position as her mother and grasps the handle, too, for it is very hard work to do alone.

This Is the Way They Grind Corn Where Tabitha Lives

"We will bake today," says Tabitha's mother. She mixes the flour with salt and water into a stiff dough, to which she adds a little fermented dough from the last baking and sets it aside to be baked later when the leaven has begun to work. Tabitha's mother and her neighbors usually do their cooking out of doors, but now during the rainy season they must cook over a charcoal fire in the house.

A Camel from the Caravan That Came In from the Desert

Later in the day, when the dough is ready for baking, Tabitha builds a fire out of sticks in a large earthen jar. Her mother shapes the dough into thin cakes and lays them on the heated sides of the jar, where they bake as nicely as in an oven of iron or tin.

While Tabitha is helping her mother with the household tasks her brother Thaddeus is playing games with the other boys, for in Palestine the boys do not have to begin to work as soon as the girls. Perhaps Tabitha's mother and father love Tabitha as much as they do Thaddeus and the baby brother, so tightly wrapped in his swaddling clothes; but when the little maid first opened her eyes upon the dimly lighted mustabeh, or upper room, there was much disappointment that she was not a boy. Tabitha takes it quite as a matter of course that she is considered of less importance in the family than her two brothers; nor does she think it unfair for Thaddeus to have more time for fun. He must begin soon to help his father in the field with the planting and plowing, but for the present he is free to play with the other boys. One of his favorite games is a kind of hockey. The boys roll up rags into balls, then they cut curved sticks with which they drive the balls into a hole in the ground called the "mother." One boy stands guard over the hole and strikes away the ball every time it threatens to drop into the hole. They play this game for hours at a time.

Today, however, when Tabitha is helping with the grinding, the fetching and the carrying, Thaddeus is practicing with his slingshot. His sling is made of goathair with a bag in the middle for the stone. It is just such a sling as the shepherd boy David used in the days long ago. Thaddeus is the best shooter of all the boys in the neighborhood, which is saying a great deal, for the boys of Palestine are very skillful with the slingshot.

Tabitha has little time for play, but she makes the most of that little. She joins some of the other little girls and boys of the neighborhood in playing wedding. She is very happy today because she is chosen to be the bride and marches at the head of the procession of her companions through the streets. Some of the boys and girls beat drums; others play on pipes, and the rest laugh and clap their hands as they skip along, trying to imitate as well as possible the real wedding processions that they have seen in the streets of their town.

The fun comes all too quickly to an end, for Tabitha must go home to help her mother prepare the evening meal. She washes the rice, which is to be the principal dish, and sets it to boil over the charcoal fire after mixing it with olive oil. Her mother adds a small piece of meat, a great treat in the family. When the rice is tender it is placed in a wooden bowl and set in the middle of the floor. All the members of the family wash their hands and sitting down on their heels they form a circle about the bowl. Father dips his right hand into the bowl and, after asking a blessing over the food, he carries the rice to his mouth in his fingers. He takes up some of the liquid with a piece of one of the cakes Tabitha helped to bake, and then passes the bowl on. This part of the meal finished, everyone has a drink of water and the children wash their hands before the elders begin to sip their strong, unsweetened coffee.

This is the very pleasantest part of the day, so Tabitha thinks. She enjoys it even more in the summer time, when the family often go to sit upon the roof in the cool of the evening. Her father has many stories to tell of his day in the fields or in the olive groves. Far away on the mountains of Lebanon there is snow at this season, but on the plains the wheat and barley are growing and oranges and lemons are ripening.

"May I not go with you next time into the town?" Tabitha begs, and her mother promises that if she is diligent in helping with the churning, the washing and the other work of the household she will take her to see the star which marks the spot where the little Babe of

Why I Know It's So By Elizabeth Knobel

I've often heard that when I sleep, all comfy in my bed,
The darling little angels come and perch upon the head;
And, oh, how kind of them to keep
Their watch above me while I sleep!
(I think sometime I'll stay awake and watch for them, instead.)

And yes, I know that this is so, I'm sure that this is right,
For once I found a feather small upon my pillow white;
The tiny, fluffy, downy thing,
It fluttered from an angel's wing!
Which proves that baby angels come and guard me through the night.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

December 28, 1913—A Day of Decision (Review)

Everyday View of the Lesson

By J. L. Scott

Golden Text, John 3:16: For God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on him should not perish, but have eternal life.

This lesson calls for a review of the entire year. A review is largely a matter of memory, and memory in turn depends largely upon interest and attention. Twelve months ago we began with the creation and followed the successive steps down to "man the crown of creation." When man came upon the earth and how long he has been here are questions that wisdom no longer seeks to ask or answer; but man is here, and God's purpose in his creation has been growing certainly throughout the year.

Man has a moral history apart from his political or social development. This we saw in "Man's First Sin." The result of the fall was soon apparent, and Cain and Abel stood out as the exponents of right and wrong. But the world failed to reform itself. The single tree of disobedience grew into a forest. Therefore God sent the flood to sweep away the race and his covenant with Noah gave man a new chance.

Faith Now Introduced as a New Element in Redemption

Salvation through works, however, failed. A new element in redemption—faith—was about to be introduced, and the "The Call of Abram" changed the current of history. From now on records become more authentic. God's purpose centers in a single person whose migrations are like the ark through the desert. Abram stands for the church of God. When Abraham is gathered to his fathers, Isaac becomes the custodian of the promise. This ends the first quarter.

The second quarter brings a steady increase in interest. Jacob is now the leading character. He is not Abraham, neither is he Isaac, but he is Jacob. Two lives were lived in him. He was twice born, once at Lahai-roi and once at Bethel. He lived at the extremes. There are people who are large enough to be themselves and someone else at the same time. Such a man was he. Today we may despise him, but tomorrow we reproach ourselves for ever having entertained harsh thoughts toward so good a man. The successful man is the one who dies better than he was born, and by that standard Jacob was fit to be a patriarch in Israel.

The lessons gradually become more and more definite. We begin to be really acquainted with their leading characters. Abraham was shadowy and moves like a supernatural being across the stage. Isaac was passive. He enjoyed the seclusion of his great estates, but Jacob and Esau we have met face to face. Their veins are full of red blood.

Children of Israel Have Prophetic Dreams of a Deliverer

The scene is now transferred to Egypt and Joseph leads the way. The story of his life most of us knew before we began the study of the lesson. For centuries the children of Israel live as a separate people in Egypt. Their occupation and religion forbid all intercourse with the Egyptians. The natives cannot understand them. They have no idols but worship an invisible Being whom they call God. They also have strange dreams about a deliverer who is yet to appear. He had been promised their fathers and the expectation had grown brighter from age to age.

The king becomes apprehensive that the children of Israel are a menace to the future of his kingdom. Possibly he has heard of this deliverer and regards him as a rival to be feared. An edict is issued that every male child born in the homes of the Israelites must be put to death. The slaughter goes on, but Moses, a handsome boy, is spared through the intervention of the king's daughter. He lives to become the greatest man in all the tide of time. Israel is delivered from the Egyptians and the third quarter closes with the scene at Sinai.

The fourth quarter is an expansion of the third. For forty years the people wander from oasis to oasis until the old generation that came from Egypt is dead and the succeeding generation inherits the promise. Moses, an old man now, with clear eye and steady tread, ascends the mountain and views the promised land from afar off—that land which he had hoped to enter. But his hope was not to be fulfilled. His successor, Joshua, crosses the Jordan like a soldier, determined on conquest. City after city falls until the country lies at his feet. The various tribes are assigned their place and the promise God made to the patriarchs is fulfilled. Israel had left Palestine as a slave; it returned as a master.

During all this time a single idea led the people as their guiding star. Abraham carried it with him from his native Ur of the Chaldees, and each in turn guarded it with zealous care. This idea was the unity of God. That thought became embodied in the Messiah, the day of whose birth the world has just celebrated.

The Path We Pursue Depends Upon Our Individual Choice

The actors upon the stage of history choose their own parts. Abraham lived in a world of falsity, but he selected the true. Moses refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter, choosing rather to suffer affliction with the people of God than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season. By the side of everyone's life runs the unbeaten path of the might-have-been. Those men chose an ideal and made it theirs. That they made the choice they did was due chiefly to their own force of character.

This day has been called Decision Day. The name implies a final choice that confirms all that has gone before. The year in its trend leads up to God. It began with creation and ended in personal service. God forces himself on no one. We can only see him as he reveals himself to us. To Adam he was a creator; to Moses a lawgiver, and to Joshua a master of battle. Each believed as he saw. And so does he reveal himself to us. We see him in the Christ and in the Christ we make our decision to be his.

Review Lesson by Lesson

By Hermon D. Jenkins

The lessons of this quarter, omitting the temperance and the Christmas lessons, cover a period of forty-five years, from 1490 B. C. to 1445 B. C. They present to us five of the greatest characters in the history of Israel—Moses, Aaron, Miriam, Joshua and Caleb; one of the strangest characters in all history, Balaam, and the typical troubler in Israel, Achan. We see both the strength and the failure, the victory and the defeat of four leading characters, Moses, Aaron, Miriam and Joshua.—Torrey.

I. One of the most important lessons we have to learn in life is to be patient with those who repay our kindness with ingratitude (Num. 11:10-25). It is said that Moses failed at this critical hour, but the Lord appeared to resent the murmurings of the people as strongly as did Moses (v. 10). Moses's failure lay not in his being deeply stung, but in his charging God with his troubles instead of charging them to man (11-13). He had no more to bear, however, than other leaders and reformers and philanthropists, who have all learned how "sharper than a serpent's tooth" is the ingratitude of those they have sought to serve.

II. Even a good man is not always safe from the envy of his own less successful and less eminent kin (Num. 12:1-16). It too often irritates the brother of a popular hero to find himself overlooked and forgotten. Sometimes a minister may win the love of his people, only to lose the love of his own wife, who resents his popularity. But far more frequently we see this hateful spirit among men of the same profession, and ministers in the villages do not always find it easy to listen to the praises of men who receive the loud calls.

Men of Faith the Ones Who Bear Up Under Difficulties

III. Faith and courage usually go together (Num. 13:13-17; 14:25). The traveler who has little or no confidence in the divine promises comes home to call all missionaries fools. But the missionary, who sees a thousand times as much to discourage him as the pleasure seeker, says to himself, "The morning cometh." Only the minister or the Sunday school teacher who believes in Omnipotence can bear up under the difficulties of his task.

IV. It is a wicked folly to take to ourselves the glory that belongs to God (Num. 20:1-13). Many a man who has won the world's plaudits has lost the world's respect when he has written his own life. It is hard to admire the reformer who is always in the right, his enemies always in the wrong; a benefactor who never made a mistake in his gifts or refusals; a scholar who invariably put his opponents to confusion, and a minister who brings all his brethren round to his own standards in time. The one mitigating circumstance in the case of Moses was that the wicked disparagement to which he was subjected tempted him very humanly to triumph over his traducers.

Conscience and Interest of Balaam Greatly at Variance

V. The sketch of Balaam is one to which men have given very inadequate study (Num. 22:1—23:10). It was intended to show us how in morals he who hesitates is lost. Balaam was versed in the mysteries of religion, one who at heart sympathized with the religion of these migrating tribes; but at the same time he had an eye always open to the main chance. His conscience looked one way, his interest led the other. His hope was somehow to reap the reward of wickedness without dipping his own hands in blood. And, as we all know, Balaam sought to compromise between his sense of duty and his hope for gain by tempting the Israelites to sin which would bring down upon their heads heavier punishment than his verbal curses could effect (Rev. 2:14). This is a temperance lesson in itself because many of the men who take the profits of the brewery and the distillery will not permit in their own houses what they place before millions, to their undoing.

VII. Every good man has visions of better things which he dies without attaining (Matt. 13:17). Moses's death (Num. 34:1-12) was at once a great sorrow and a great blessing. He was saved many of the disappointments which Joshua had to endure. We felt it a great calamity when on the very day of his triumph Abraham Lincoln was struck down. But after we had experienced the disorders of the reconstruction period we understood how reward may sometimes look like penalty.

VIII. But a good cause is never lost with the loss of its great leader. Joshua succeeded Moses without a break in continuity. He went about his task like a man worthy to be trusted. During a great war we have army chiefs who assume command with a flourish of trumpets, and yet others who so far distrust themselves that the whole army is depressed. But Joshua made neither mistake. He was a hero without bravado, wearing the heart of a child in the breast of a soldier.

Moses Exalted After Death for Purpose of Disparaging Joshua

IX. Joshua's Lord accorded him a signal token of approval (Josh. 3:1-17), enabling him to cross the swollen Jordan without difficulty or danger. Many a man who had thought little of Moses while the great leader was living exalted him after death to disparage Joshua. So the new Sunday school teacher or minister often enters upon his work overshadowed by the fame of his predecessor and suspected by those who were never any great comfort to the Moses whom they profess to mourn.

X. The fall of Jericho (Josh. 5:10—6:27) was designed to show the Israelites that their real Commander and Leader was always present. They were led to the most difficult attack first and they won their victory by supernatural intervention. One frequently reads in the secular press a veiled sneer at the sanguine hopes of the church for the conversion of the world. If God is with it, it cannot fail. If God is not with it, it cannot succeed. So far church history has been a history of providence closely resembling the miraculous. And we look for the walls yet to fall.

XI. The sin of Achan (Josh. 7:6-15) has its lesson for today, a day in which many a fighter for a good cause is willing secretly to appropriate some of the spoils. The candid politician in the nominating convention asked bluntly, "What are you here for if not for offices?" That was the spirit of Achan, a spirit yet alive. When we resort to "the dread arbitrament of war" there should be no thought of loot. That is the lesson which the death of Achan is designed to impress upon our minds and consciences today.

DEVOTIONAL SERVICE

BY EDWARD ARTHUR WICHER

Week Beginning December 21, 1913

TOPIC—The good Samaritan. Luke 10:30-35.

While Jesus was speaking a lawyer came forward to question him. The lawyer was a teacher of law, and his business was not very different from that of the scribe, who devoted himself to the study of the Scriptures. One man may have been both, for in Mark's narrative he is called a scribe (Mark 12:28). While having something of the casuistical spirit of the school in which he had been trained, he seems to have been more sincere, more open to conviction than most of the professional religious teachers. The American standard version brings out clearly the disposition with which he asked his first question. He came to Jesus, not "tempting him" as though he were trying to entrap the Master in his answer but "putting him to the test" as though he would discover how competent a religious teacher Jesus might be. A knowledge of the character of the lawyer who asked the questions is necessary to the understanding of the meaning of the parable.

The question the lawyer asked was one of the most frequent in rabbinical discussion. Matthew gives it to us thus: "Which is the great commandment in the law?" The sense of Mark is the same. Luke changed it to "What shall I do to inherit eternal life?"

Jesus sees that the lawyer is serious and he treats him seriously. He quickly turns the question back to him and asks: "What readest thou in the law? Thou knowest where to find the answer." The lawyer's answer is a good one. There is no love of God which does not issue in the love of one's neighbor; neither is there any love of one's neighbor which does not flow from the springs of the love of God. One can see the flash of sudden insight in the countenance of the lawyer; and Jesus, looking upon him, commends him.

But the lawyer is not yet prepared wholly to yield. The old casuistic spirit is struggling with the newborn spirit of light. The lawyer is desirous of justifying himself in the eyes of his coreligionists and he asks, "Who is my neighbor?" as though this question were not so easy of solution. The answer of Jesus is the parable of the good Samaritan. It is an answer also to the question the lawyer ought to have asked: "To whom am I a neighbor?" It is the Christian form of the answer to a Jewish question.

The road from Jerusalem to Jericho was infested with robbers in the time of Jesus; it always has been so; it is so today. This poor Jew, traveling homeward along this road from the temple worship, was robbed, wounded and left for dead.

Three travelers passed by chance along that way. We speak of chances, but in God's providence there are no accidents. The opportunity for a kindly deed seemed fortuitous, but it was part of the divine arrangement.

The first of these travelers was a priest returning from his official duties in Jerusalem to his home in the priestly city of Jericho. Of course he would stop and care for this wounded man, for he was a mediator of a religion that made men's hearts compassionate. But, no! He was selfishly afraid of the ceremonial defilement (Num. 19:11-13) that would ensue and thus forgot the higher obligation (Deut. 22:1-4. Compare I. John 3:17). Perhaps the robbers might be still lurking in the neighborhood. Or it might be that he had an engagement in Jericho which he could not meet if he were to stop and care for this sick man. To spend time on this man would interrupt the discharge of his duty. Besides, no one was here to see whether he fulfilled, or failed to fulfill, his obligations of charity to his fellow countryman. So he hurried past. His religion was wholly external—and futile.

The second man was a Levite. His utter heartlessness was shown in that he crossed the road to the place where the wounded man lay, looked down upon him with curiosity and then continued his journey. His Levitical character did not save him from inhumanity. The complete failure of the Jewish religion in the face of an appeal for practical human pity could not be more vividly illustrated (compare Gal. 3:16-23). The whole force of the parable is directed equally against an externalized Christianity.

The third traveler was a Samaritan, coming down, it may be, from his illegitimate worship on Mount Gerizim. Such worship naturally tends to make men barbarous. So thinks the Jew. Certain it is that the wounded man lying by the road would not have been likely to aid the Samaritan if their positions had been reversed. But how account for the humanity of the barbarian and the inhumanity of the man who is well instructed in the true religion? Evidently the spirit of Christ is something deeper than outward forms. He recognizes his spiritual affinity with the Samaritan.

Herein was the greatness of Christ manifested, for it was only in the previous chapter of Luke (9:51-56) that the Samaritans refused to receive him because his face was set as though he would go to Jerusalem. Not all Samaritans were compassionate; neither were all Jews pitiless, but Jesus is now speaking to a Jew. He knew that the despised Samaritan was sometimes more truly magnanimous than the Jew, more truly a neighbor to the distressed; and wherever the spirit of neighborliness dwelt in a human heart there he found a spiritual kinship with himself.

This parable is not intended to teach the lawyer that by deeds of charity shall eternal life be won, as some of the expositors, especially those of the Roman Church, have mistakenly taught. But it is intended to teach that the only neighborliness worthy of the name is the neighborliness that manifests itself in gentle deeds of service and compassion. And the only religion worthy of the name is that in which the love of God is conjoined with the love of our neighbor as ourselves. Here is the great lesson for us Christians. Over against our pettiness and failure of brotherly love Christ sets the great law of compassion, which bids us suffer with the suffering and rejoice with the joyful; which calls upon us to love one another without respect of name, creed or sign, without distinction of race, color or station. He is neighbor to another man who helps the other man in the time of his need. And the Saviour himself is the great Helper.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S SERVICE

COMMENTS IN BRIEF BY WILLIAM T. ELLIS

December 28, 1913

THE NEW COSMOPOLITANISM

TOPIC—Our church at work for the world. Mark 16:14-20.

In his Mobile speech President Wilson put into the language of statecraft the old missionary principle, with which he had become indoctrinated as a boy in a Presbyterian manse, that one nation's business with other nations, like one man's business with other men, is primarily to be helpful to them. The law of life for countries as for individuals is service. And, by the logical extension of that truth, we are bound to seek relationship with all the world in order to promote the usefulness of our ministry and to bring in the reign of universal brotherhood. This missionary spirit is the very genius of the day's cosmopolitanism. The new diplomacy is nothing more or less than the old-fashioned missionary idea which our mothers were practicing before ever the statesmen became aware of it.

As Atlas of old bore the earth on his back, so every Christian bears on his heart the world bequeathed to us by the Lord Jesus.

President Nicholas Murray Butler once pleaded for "an international mind." The phrase is a good one. The modern man is not up to date unless he takes the whole world into his thinking. We follow in the train of the compassionate Christ when we feel pity for the multitude of mankind, with all its deep needs.

They really serve the world who pray for the coming of that kingdom whose dawning brings the light of justice, liberty and brotherhood.

This is the day of big things. Our times exult in magnitude. Largeness is counted a virtue. Therefore the dimensions of the missionary propaganda should commend this world work of the Christian church. With $30,000,000 a year being spent for foreign missions by the Protestant churches of the world and with an army of about 25,000 missionaries on the field this enterprise deserves to rank as the greatest undertaking of our time, apart altogether from its spiritual significance.

Judged by its fruits—and is there really any other way to judge anything—the work of missions has been a huge and staggering success. It has made over into new creatures myriads of men and women, transforming the deepest springs of their character. Social, political and educational usages hoary with age have been superseded by Christian standards. The very form of great nations has been changed. An era of world unity has been brought into existence. The Christ-laws have been written into the statutes of the states, into business, into social relationships and into international relationships. Whenever any far-sighted statesman views the whole horizon of our time he gives honor to the influence of Christian missions.

One of the advantages of membership in a Christian church is that every member has a share in the worldwide work of the whole body. It is no small boon to be a factor in the transformation of China, the uplift of India, the revivifying of Japan, the making over of Turkey, the emancipation of Persia and the civilizing of tropical Africa. The swiftest, shortest, cheapest and easiest way of becoming a factor in the big world's progress is to aid in the cause of Christian missions.

The largeness of the church's work abroad helps to deliver us from the smallness of some of our ideas at home.

Relatively, the greatest triumphs of the church are being achieved on the foreign mission field. Like a great commercial house which is doing its best business in its newest branches, the church has found that she gets results more quickly and accomplishes her historic work more distinctly amid the non-Christian peoples to whom she has of late carried the gospel, than is the case in the so-called Christian lands.

Jadedness and ennui have come to many from lack of adequate life interest. Foreign missions supply that interest to all who are alert enough to pursue the subject. Athrob with life, with human interest, with conquest thrills and with the attraction of strange lands, peoples and customs, the cause of missions also extends into the broader fields of world politics, of social problems, of racial relationships, of civilization's advance, and of all the sciences that have a human side.

To Add Interest to the Meeting

Pictures always add to the interest of a missionary meeting, although considerable time and effort must be spent to get a good collection for use in this meeting. There ought to be displayed, too, a large map of the world.

In the volume of reports of the Presbyterian boards will be found sketch maps giving the location of each mission of the church. The total number of missionaries and what they have accomplished can also be found there. Dig up some of this information for blackboard use. Your pastor has this report. Comparison with reports five years ago will prove interesting also.

That native Christians at some of the mission stations established by our missionaries are themselves sending money to other mission stations will surprise many Endeavorers. Run down these facts.

MISSIONARY WORK

An American Suregon in Tabriz

Last February the Board of Foreign Missions sent out to Tabriz, Persia, a rather exceptional young man. A graduate of Park College, Dr. Lamme took a course also in the University of Chicago before his medical instruction at Rush Medical College began. This finished, he had a year as interne under Dr. Arthur Dean Bevan at the Chicago Presbyterian hospital and later a year of private practice in and near Chicago. With this preparation Dr. Lamme might have won his way to high position in America. Yet he chose the small salary and comparative obscurity of the medical missionary in a Moslem country.

There is no hospital at Tabriz. Dr. Vanneman has developed a large dispensary practice and Dr. Edna Orcutt has a woman's dispensary which is doing a fine work, but there is no place where surgical work can be done safely. Tabriz is a city of 200,000 inhabitants and there are many towns and villages near, and there is as yet no access for these people to surgical care. Dr. Lamme writes: "It is hard to see some of these cases, who need surgical care, and have to tell them that maybe in a year or two we will be able to care for them. Some come who cannot be refused, and I have done four major operations—all on Moslems. But these native homes are far from attractive places in which to do modern aseptic surgery, and now that people are hearing that there is a man doing surgery it is becoming harder and harder to meet the demand. The board has authorized the raising of $21,000 for the proposed hospital plant—a modest one but sufficient for our present needs. We have already purchased a nice piece of ground, but we lack about $6,000 of the desired amount, exclusive of furnishings. The board has appropriated some and hopes that we may be able to find those who would be willing to make up the remainder. I think we could be almost self-supporting. The dispensary has been so for over twenty years."

Anyone interested in giving to this hospital, over and above regular pledges, should address Dwight H. Day, treasurer, 156 5th avenue, New York City. "A Christmas present for Persia—the country whence came the magi following the star to where the young child lay!"

A Fourth Generation Christian in India

The court poet of the rajah of Tagore, in that picturesque native state in India, eighty-three years ago was a Christian. It was he who wrote out the whole Bible in poetical lines and these are now the treasured heritage of the Tamil Christians of the South. When he was a lad of 9 years he was taken up from his heathen home by the great Danish missionary, Christian Friedrich Schwartz, who had labored with success from the day that he landed in 1750. Recently in Madras the Methodist missionaries held a reception for Hindu and Moslem women in honor of Miss Grace Stephens, superintendent of the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society, and others who were traveling with her and the great grandson of the court poet appeared on the program. He is an itinerant singer and preacher, and bears the name of Baghavadar Vedanayaga Sastriar, the last two words being the name of his distinguished ancestor. Fourth generation Christians are a good deal of a novelty in India.

Prayer Embarrassingly Answered

Rev. H. C. Shulet writes from Resht, Persia, of the embarrassment of answered prayer. He says:

"For years the missionaries of this land have been praying that the doors of opportunity for presenting the gospel of Christ might be opened and that the opposition of bigotry and ignorance might give way to a spirit of larger liberality and a greater readiness to listen to the word of God. These prayers are in these latter days being answered and so rapidly are opportunities and requests for the opening of new work coming to us that we are far from able to keep up with the constantly growing demand with the limited force of missionaries and native workers we have to carry on our present work. Several of our stations are sadly undermanned, while in every station the call to new and wider fields of endeavor is so insistent and the opportunities so enticing that the missionary is sorely tempted to add to his already heavy burden just one task more, so that the opportunity will not be lost or the call left unanswered."

Dr. Janvier Greeted at Allahabad

The arrival of Dr. C. A. R. Janvier, late of Philadelphia, who is to assume the principalship of Ewing Christian College, Allahabad, was greeted with enthusiasm by Americans, Englishmen and Indians, not only in Allahabad but throughout North India. In his long service as a missionary prior to his departure from India in 1901 he made many friends among all communities who are still here to welcome him and through them his reputation had widely spread when it was announced that he would return. Even old mission servants and native merchants in the bazar have been asking for months when the "Bara Sahib"—"the chief"—would arrive.

Dr. C. A. R. Janvier

It was an effort for him to keep up his Hindustani during his long residence in America, but he must have felt amply repaid for it when he saw how strong a bond his fluency in speaking it made between him and his new Indian friends. He preached in the vernacular in the Jumna church a week after arriving and the next day came his introduction to his college students. They were assembled in the new assembly hall, which is the gift of the Misses Tooker of Orange, N. J., and is just being completed. He gave them an address in English on the purpose of the college, and then without any warning launched into Hindustani. The students broke into spontaneous applause and now they are all telling us of lesser linguistic accomplishments how he speaks it just like one of th m.

He assumed full control of the college on Nov. 1. Dr. H. P. Edwards, who has won the admiration of his students and colleagues by the way he has filled the difficult position of acting principal since the death of Dr. Arthur H. Ewing last September, will now devote his whole time to the department of physics and to his duties as manager of the Jumna school, which has an enrollment of 679 boys this session.

Valuable Book for Asian Travelers

Christian people interested in foreign missions ought not to go abroad on any journey in which they expect to touch Japan, China, the Philippines, Burma, India or Egypt without securing before they start the "Tourist Directory of Christian Work." Indeed, the book ought to be commended equally to tourists who are not interested in foreign missions, for it would be a practical means of education to them. The booklet has been prepared by an interdenominational committee appointed for the purpose by the Foreign Missions Conference of North America. Secretary Robert E. Speer of the Presbyterian Board is chairman of the committee.

The contents of the little volume are occupied mainly with directions which tell the traveler how he may find the most important missionary operations in the lands mentioned, and also where on the Sabbath day he will find religious services conducted in English. There are twenty-four pictures by way of illustration and Secretary Arthur J. Brown, also of the Presbyterian Board, has written considerable introductory material which describes briefly the various kinds of effort in which Christian missionaries are engaged abroad and incidentally deals with common criticisms launched against their work.

Copies of the "Tourist Directory" may be obtained free by prospective travelers if they address the Anglo-American Communities Committee, room 806, 156 5th avenue, New York City, with a statement that they are about to sail for Asia. Other persons not intending to travel may obtain the publication postpaid from same address by sending 25 cents. Copies will also be found on transpacific liners, all of which now have missionary books in their libraries. Likewise, copies will be placed in the libraries of the boats belonging to lines connecting England and India. Tourist agencies may likewise be relied upon to supply them.

A "China Campaign" Despite Cold

Technically, we call the endeavor on the part of the churches in America to provide a hundred new missionaries within three years to meet the emergency in China the China campaign, but when one reads of Mrs. Melrose and her two comrades' night in charge of fifty badly wounded patients, whose language not one of them could speak, or of such touring as Rev. C. E. Scott of Tsintau here describes, it is evident that the real "campaign" is over yonder: "You ought to see our country Christians," he writes, "and know what they endure for Christ's sake. Napoleon should have had them on his Moscow campaign. Cold doesn't affect them; mud houses, dirt floors, no fires, biting winds, paper window panes full of holes, open doors; everywhere revivals under these freezing-to-the-marrow conditions. I wear heaviest underclothes, sweaters, a double corduroy deerskin hunting suit and a corduroy great coat lined with sheep skin. In meetings I wear several pair of socks and heavy shoes with fuzz inside, and that for size astonish the natives."

—Dr. S. T. Davis of Kansas City, who is traveling in mission fields, accompanied Rev. Paul R. Abbott on his field itinerating trip out of Chefoo, China. This is the trip which for years Dr. Corbett, ex-moderator of the assembly, has taken annually, but Mr. Abbott was obliged to substitute for the venerable ex-moderator this year on account of the latter's illness and failing strength. Messrs. Abbott and Davis traveled 275 miles in twenty days and visited twenty-three stations, administering the Lord's supper fifteen times.

Board Notes and Announcements

—The Friday morning meeting of the Board of the Northwest, Chicago, was led by Mrs. A. A. Hays, secretary of the extension work. Mrs. George C. Doolittle of Sidon, Syria, who had last spoken in Room 48 ten years ago, told of the government schools for girls, called into being by the mission schools. There are 7,000 pupils in the Presbyterian schools of Syria and as many in the Sunday schools. Miss Bertha G. Johnson, field secretary of the mission of lepers, brought good news from India, China, Siam and Korea. The first letter received from Miss Alice O. Ensign, who went last August to Hamadan, Persia, told of her journey "through country which seemed to be a part of a different world," and of her health and happiness in Faith Hubbard School.

—Among others who have lately arrived out, Miss Lulu A. Francis is now at home in Soochow, China, and Mrs. Philip H. Dowling, bound for Toayuen, is spending her first year at the Nanking language school.

—The Foreign Mission Board at New York has just issued two new pamphlets put up in attractive form. They are: "Scientific Facts for Scientific Minds," and "The Open Door in Persia," at 1 and 2 cents respectively.

NEW BOOKS

Appropriate for the Winter's Reading

Travel, Description, Nature

My Life with the Eskimos, by Vilhjalmur Stefansson. This is a book for those who enjoy the actual adventures of real men more than the ingenious but imaginary exploits of fictitious personages. The term "red blooded" has been overworked, but it is propertly applicable to Explorer Stefansson, who has spent years within the Arctic circle and who talks familiarly of scenes and situations that would daunt the average molly-coddled individual. Anyone who thinks for a moment that the valiant spirit of the old vikings no longer exists among the Americanized Norsemen of today need but to contemplate the predicament in which Mr. Stefansson found himself when the ship failed him after he had intrusted to it his outfit while he himself journeyed overland. The ship did not meet him as planned and there he was "200 miles north of the Polar circle with a summer suit of clothing, a camera, some notebooks, a rifle and 200 rounds of ammunition, facing an Arctic winter — where my only shelter would have to be the roof of some hospitable Eskimo house." Deplorable enough, we should think, yet the explorer considers it a fortunate circumstance—at least in the retrospect — for it enabled him to live "with" instead of "near" the Eskimos and to study them when they were not wearing their company manner; his very poverty, he found, was his greatest advantage. They took him into their houses and snow camps and treated him exactly as if he were one of them. This explorer and author is also a scientist—an ethnologist—of no small standing. The discovery of that strange phenomenon of the far North, the blond Eskimo, is for the first time told in detail. The blond Eskimos of Victoria island, says Stefansson, look like Europeans in spite of their garb. Either they are the descendants of lost Scandinavians or else they add a new mystery for the future to solve. Three of the men had beards the color of his own and looked like white deckhands on a whaler. Stefansson personally examined 140 individuals and records that the form of the head also strongly suggests the European, but the people are Eskimo in language and culture. Dr. Rudolph Martin Anderson, a former classmate at the University of Iowa, who had won honors both in scholarship and in athletics, an authority on birds and animals, was Stefansson's companion on his second expedition. Dr. Anderson writes an appendix on the natural history collection which they made, his report also covering the topography and geology of the regions visited by boat and sledge from Point Barrow, Alaska, east to the southern portion of Victoria island. One remarkable spot described lies east of Cape Bathurst, near the mouth of the Horton river, where are the so-called "smoking mountains" or burning cliffs. These fire holes emit smoke and gas and the smell is always strongly sulphurous. The burning material is apparently a carbonaceous shale. Neighboring Eskimos believe that the subterranean fires are kept alive by spirits and they are accustomed to leave small votive offerings of food when passing with their sleds. A timely interest is added by the recent news from Stefansson's latest expedition, the explorer and his ship having been separated by polar ice. [Macmillan Company, New York. $4.

Insects: Their Life-Histories and Habits, by Harold Bastin, is a handsome octavo for the specialist or the interested layman setting forth in thorough fashion the salient facts of entomology. Perhaps it is more fair to Mr. Bastin's efforts to emphasize the fact of his book's appeal to the general reader. It has been written so simply and with such a wealth of explanation of terminology that it will come easily within the range of anyone who wants reliable information on the subject. The book's make-up is extremely attractive and there appear to be hundreds of illustrations. [Frederick A. Stokes Company, New York. $2.50 net.

The Booklover's London, by A. St. John Adcock; with twenty illustrations by Frederick Adcock. "Going up Cornhill a year or two ago on a day when snow was falling," says Mr. Adcock, "I happened to remember that somewhere about there was the court in which Scrooge of Dickens's 'Christmas Carol' had his home and business premises and that coming from his bleak tank of an office one cutting, wintry night Scrooge's clerk, Bob Cratchit, was so carried away by the joyous spirit of the season that 'he went down a slide on Cornhill, at the end of a lane of boys, twenty times in honor of its being Christmas eve.' And somehow Bob Cratchit became as real to me in that moment as were any of the obvious people swarming on the pavement around me. . . . Why should we differentiate between people who were once clay and are now dreams, and people who never had to pass through that gross period of probation but have been dreams from the beginning?" Why, indeed? London means many things to many minds. But to those of us who roam her streets and explore her corners, seeking association with her citizens of other days, the creatures of inspirational fancy are as much a part of our quest as they who created them, and the scenes that never happened are as ever-present in our minds as the most unassailable episodes of history. Mr. Adcock's book is a delightful supplement to his two other books on London. He is one of the most satisfying of all the guides who have essayed to lead us to London's literary and historic shrines. [Macmillan Company, New York. $1.75 net.

The Country of Sir Walter Scott, by Charles S. Olcott. The lover of Scott may do something almost as pleasant as visiting his hero's country by reading this account of Mr. Olcott's trip there. It was a trip based upon comprehensive knowledge of Scott's novels, poetry, country and life, its aim being to trace the whole scene with which he was identified and actually to "live" the Waverley novels, so far as such a thing is possible. Mr. Olcott reports that it was surprising to find how many settings were exactly as Scott described them and how definite an impression he received of the Scotchman's personality while wandering through Carlisle, Dumfries, Melrose, Edinburgh, Berwick, Glasgow, Sterling, Collander, the Trossachs, Oban and the environs of those centers. The book is delightfully written and supplemented by a collection of photographs which includes many that are new and of special interest. There are also a photagravure portrait and maps. The Southland of North America, by George Palmer Putnam. At our very door, says the author in a preface to these "rambles and observations in Central America during the year 1912," lies an almost untouched treasureland of fascinating possibility. Succeeding pages amply bear out his statement and deserve to be read by everyone who wishes to be intelligent about Central America and especially by the more enthusiastic disciples of the Monroe doctrine. Of the republics Mr. Putnam describes, Costa Rica and Salvador are seriously deserving of the name. Nicaragua is bankrupt in men and money, and so unable to realize on her natural resources. Honduras, a nation of Indians and halfbreeds with pure Spanish blood in a decided minority, has a debt of $125,000,000 which it has no idea of paying and no ability to pay. Guatemala is governed by a despot of the Diaz type and is likely to fall without warning. The author puts up the facts of this situation to his countrymen and asks whether they will remodel the Monroe doctrine or stir up a hornets' nest by trying to live up to its implication. But of course this is only one aspect of a most interesting book splendidly illustrated. The stay-at-home traveler, the contemplator of a Central American journey and the nature lover will alike find enjoyment as well as instruction in its pages. [G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York. $2.50 net.

Wild Life Across the World, written and illustrated by Cherry Kearton; with introduction by Theodore Roosevelt. It takes half an hour to examine the interesting photographs in this volume and after that almost no one can rest content until he has got into the text. The Kearton brothers, who have an international reputation for nature photography, met Colonel Roosevelt in the heart of Africa and the latter vouches for the trustworthiness of their photographs in his introduction. The volume is a record of adventure and exploration in Borneo, India, Africa, Canada and the United States. It was Mr. Kearton's first trip to Africa and the chapters devoted to big game there are particularly engrossing. There's an account of a lion-spearing expedition that reads with the greatest thrill; but, taken all in all, it is Mr. Kearton's descriptions of wild life in remote places rather than his hunting adventures that make his book notable. One of the photographs is of Colonel Roosevelt talking with the author in Nyeri. [George H. Doran Company, New York. $5 net.

The Cities of Romagna and the Marches, by Edward Hutton. Mr. Hutton reveals his spirit in what he has to say of the republic of San Marino: "In these days, when the second rate efficiency of the Teuton threatens to engulf everything that is vital and characteristic in Europe, we should be eager to encourage and consider such little states as those of Andorra and San Marino. Not that they can in any way help to stem the flood of mud that rolls over us all from the Germanies, but that in their happiness and sturdy independence they serve as examples of all that we should lose by a Germanic domination, under which all that is most divine in us, most characteristic and genuine would be smothered by the most accursed mediocrity that ever appeared in Europe and would be crushed out of existence by a system, a training and a tradition essentially barbarous, atheistic and hopeless." No modernist is Mr. Hutton. The cities he describes in this volume have for the most part been less touched by that "accursed mediocrity" he denounces than many of Italy's old towns. Ravenna has been asleep and dreaming over her great past for more than a thousand years; Rimini has made no history about which anybody cares since 1468; and "Urbino in the sunset looks still as though Cesare Borgia had just passed by." Mr. Hutton is an earnest student of history and he has loitered in Italian byways and dwelt in Italian towns until he has been thoroughly imbued with the spirit of Italy's incomparable past. The book has thirty-two illustrations, twelve of them in color. [Macmillan Company, New York. $1.75 net.

CONINGSBURGH CASTLE

A Stained Glass Tour in Italy, by Charles Hitchcock Sherrill, author of "Stained Glass Tours in France" and "Stained Glass Tours in Egland." Mr. Sherrill has a profound knowledge of his subject, but writes about it very simply and in a style devoid of technicalities. His chapters are so scant in detail, however, that they scarcely do more than tell where notable examples of old Italian glazing are to be found. The book is a disappointment in that it gives little aid to understanding historic glass. Mr. Sherrill is a pleasant writer, but he has, it would seem, been afraid to be specific. He makes us glance and hasten on—like "the man from Cook's." [John Lane Company, New York. $2.50 net.

The Soul of Paris and Other Essays, by Verner Z. Reed; illustrated by Ernest C. Peixotto. The author has embodied his travels in the essay form so that his book serves one function almost as well as the other. The illustrations are representative of Mr. Peixotto's admirable etching ability. [John Lane Company, New York. $2.50 net.

Biography and Memoirs

Michael Fairless: Her Life and Writings, by W. Scott Palmer and A. M. Haggard. This short biography of the woman who wrote "The Roadmender," "The Gathering of Brother Hilarius" and "The Grey Brethren" will appeal strongly to the lovers of those strangely mystical but essentially sane books—books of which the first is already a classic both in form and in the power of consolation which we always associate with the older and staider classic writers. In these pages we are told how "The Roadmender" was written in the very face of death—written in fact with the author's left hand when the progress of disease had disabled her. It is safe to say that every reader of the heroic author, Michael Fairless, will wish to make the acquaintance of the woman, Margaret Fairless Barber, who, so personally reticent, yet told the true story of her soul in "The Roadmender." [E. P. Dutton and Company, New York. $1.

Memoirs of an American Prima Donna, by Clara Louise Kellogg. The interest of primacy attaches itself in several ways to the name of Clara Louise Kellogg, now Clara Louise Strakosch. She is described as the first American prima donna to win recognition abroad, the first to sing "Aida" and "Carmen" in English, the first, as the head of her own company, to produce Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" in America, where also she created the role of Marguerite in Gounod's "Faust." Among those to whom her achievements are a household word the memoirs will revive many memories associated both with her name and that of the large number of illustrious persons to whom she makes free reference throughout the pages. She writes with the aim of encouraging young singers and her cheery, human account of the life of the opera singer will inevitably serve as an inspiration to many. [G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York. $2.50 net.

Prince Charlie, by William Power. This is a brief sketch of a picturesque historical episode and of a useless life—the career of the last of the Stuarts, "bonnie Prince Charlie." For in 1745 the prince was indeed a bonnie figure and he fired the hearts of the Scotch Highlanders into a fierce but futile uprising against the English power. Those were the days when the Highlands were at their romantic best, and the magnetic young prince — he reached his zenith at 26— was their hero. The author's style is matter-of-fact, but the recital of Prince Charlie's experiences both before and after the duke of Cumberland had wiped out the Scotch insurgents makes a moving tale. The prince's subsequent years on the Continent amounted to naught, though he continued to live in Highland verse. The pictures, mostly in color from famous paintings and engravings, are the feature of the book. [Frederick A. Stokes Company, New York. $1.75 net.

Poetry and the Drama

Lyric Poetry, by Ernest Rhys. This addition to Messrs. Duttons' "Channels of English Literature" is a notable piece of work, comprising as it does in one volume a history of the English lyric from Beowulf to the end of the Victorian era. Of English poetry as reflecting the English imagination, world view and aspiration Mr. Rhys has less to say than of it as verbal music, the gradual working out and enriching of a lyric canon. Criticism of a work involving such historical scholarship and displaying such taste as this seems ungracious and perhaps such matters as a one-line mention of Thomas Hood—and that referring only to his humorous work—should be overlooked. A more serious lapse, however, is an apparent omission of Francis Thompson. We say "apparent" because, though his name is printed in the index, a careful search through the book fails to disclose any mention of him, while the poet whom he so admired and so excelled—Coventry Patmore—is given comparatively generous space. On the other hand, a poet very little known, William Cory Johnson-Cory, receives deserved mention. [E. P. Dutton and Company, New York. $1.50 net.

The Complete Poems of Paul Laurence Dunbar. There are 413 poems in this first collected edition of the negro poet's verse. William Dean Howells, who once referred to Dunbar as the first instance of the American negro to evince innate distinction in literature, has furnished an introduction—that which originally appeared in "Lyrics of a Lowly Life"—and there is more than one poem in the collection which bears out his dictum of "a work of art." Almost everyone is more or less familiar with the dialect poems, but there are so many here in straight English that one comes to think of Dunbar less exclusively as a racial poet. Take "Rain-Songs," an exquisite lyric:

> "The rain streams down like harpstrings from the sky;
> The wind, that world-old harpist, sitteth by;
> And ever as he sings his low refrain,
> He plays upon the harpstrings of the rain."

We are deeply indebted to the publishers who at last make it possible to put a one-volume Dunbar on our poetry shelves. There is a photogravure portrait. [Dodd, Mead and Company, New York. $2 net.

The Toiling of Felix, by Henry van Dyke. A poem of deep spiritual significance which has been published in an attractive edition with four paintings in color, decorations and letter text by Herbert Moore. Dr. van Dyke tells in a prefatory note of the fragment of a papyrus book, written in the second or third century, discovered by some English explorers in 1897 in the rubbish heaps of an ancient city near the Nile. It is to one of the sentences on this paper that his poem refers. The story, to put it briefly, is a boy's search for Christ, and Henrik Ibsen, by Henry Rose. Thus far the English-speaking public has depended upon Mr. Archer for help in understanding Ibsen, but Archer's studies of the great Norwegian poet and novelist are on a somewhat larger scale than the busy reader can afford. Mr. Rose furnishes in this small volume a much more compact and usable manual, dealing particularly with the symbolical features of the great author's social and psychological plays, and showing the growth, continuity and consistency of his thought as expressed in his writings. In order to do this, however, Mr. Rose naturally enters into a brief analysis of Ibsen's principal works in their succession, pointing out the specific governing thought of each with illustrative expositions of the thought in the words of the great author. This serves a twofold purpose. It enables the reader to follow the development of Isben's literary and intellectual work with intelligence and relish and it also begets a taste and a desire for the fuller enjoyment of the poet's productions by studying them in their own original form. [Dodd, Mead and Company, New York. $1.

The Woods, by Douglas Malloch, is a collection of songs for the lumbermen, its themes ranging from the city street to the shaded quiet of the deepest forest. Mr. Malloch writes simple, unaffected verse which should be read for its cheery optimism. The theme he constantly reiterates is:

"There's some of us has this world's goods,
An' some of us has none—
But all of us has got the woods,
An' all has got the sun."

The Romance of the American Theater, by Mary Caroline Crawford. The keynote of this reminiscent volume is its interesting revival of memories associated with our early theater. Miss Crawford has put an ardor of research into her work and her gift for writing is so definite that she makes every page intensely readable. Edwin Booth is given specially interesting treatment. The photographs and old prints are numerous and the volume is well bound and printed. [Little, Brown and Company, Boston. $2.50 net.

The Great Adventure: A Play of Fancy in Four Acts, by Arnold Bennett. A dramatization of Mr. Bennett's popular comedy-novel, "Buried Alive," which somehow doesn't seem as amusing as we have come to expect Mr. Bennett to be. Interior Decoration and Collecting

The House in Good Taste, by Elsie de Wolfe. Miss de Wolfe is an authority on house decoration; she has carried out her ideas in many homes and buildings recognized as tasteful in the real sense of the word, one notable example being the Colony Club of New York, for whose exquisite decoration she is exclusively responsible. Thus it is interesting and valuable to have her ideas in book form supplemented as they are here with many full-page photographs. Miss de Wolfe discusses the possibilities of small houses, apartments, the art of treillage, the treatment of walls, doors, windows, halls, staircases, the effective use of color, chintz, flowers, the problem of artificial light and many other details—always with the emphasis upon suitability, simplicity and proportion. There is no more appropriate gift for the person who is building a new house or remodeling an old one than this very decorative volume. [Century Company, New York. $2.50 net.

The Curious Lore of Precious Stones: A Description of Their Sentiments and Folk Lore, Superstitions, Symbolism, Mysticism, Use in Medicine, Protection, Prevention, Religion and Divination, Crystal Gazing, Birth-Stones, Lucky Stones and Talismans, Astral, Zodiacal and Planetary, by George Frederick Kunz. Dr. Kunz has so many long titles after his name that we have space to mention only one of them—namely, honorable curator of precious stones in the American Museum of Natural History. His book is of unquestionable value for the specialist and contains much that the general reader will be interested in. Very attractively illustrated. [J. B. Lippincott Company, Philadelphia. $5 net.

First Steps in Collecting, by Grace M. Vallois. The chatty, confidential, almost gossipy, way in which Miss Vallois approaches her subject removes her volume from those dry specialist treatises that are so unenjoyable to the majority. She tells, for instance, how to distinguish between Heppelwhite and Chippendale furniture, how to collect old pottery and glass, tea tables, cabinets and many of the more obvious details of the collector's art. There are many illustrations. [J. B. Lippincott Company, Philadelphia. $1.50 net.

Art and Architecture

Colonial Architecture for Those About to Build, by Herbert C. Wise and H. Ferdinand Beidleman, is one of the most comprehensive volumes in its field that has ever been put into what may be termed gift-book form. For it not only offers a thorough study of the art and architecture of the Georgian period in this country, but it has been so sumptuously illustrated and bound that it stands out as one of the most desirable gifts of the season. Its authors have confined their research to Pennsylvania, New Jersey and Delaware, studying the best examples of domestic, municipal and institutional buildings to be found in that region. The chapters dealing with the historic homes of Philadelphia are of absorbing interest, the photographs accompanying them being chosen with rare taste. The two notes that need emphasizing in talking of this book are the scope and cleanness of its detail and its remarkable photographs. [J. B. Lippincott Company, Philadelphia. $5 net.

The Renaissance: Savonarola, Cesare Borgia, Julius II., Leo X., Michael Angelo, by Arthur Count Gobineau; edited by Dr. Oscar Levy. This volume contains the five historical scenes through the medium of which Count Gobineau, one of the most brilliant scholars of the last century, presented the essence of the Italian renaissance. They cover the most interesting period in Florentine history, from the time of Savonarola to the death of Michael Angelo. Written by one who has thoroughly familiarized himself with the hopes, ideas and aspirations of those brilliant minds of the renaissance, this book is a splendid acquisition both to history and literature and deserves to be ranked as a classic in this country as it long has been in Germany. The Message of Greek Art, by H. H. Powers, has for its aim not a history of Hellenistic production but a consideration of the people behind the art—one which will make them more tangible and more easily understood. Books of Sacred Interest

The Pictorial Life of Christ, by Ira Seymour Dodd; with eighty-five full-page reproductions from plastic models by D. Mastroianni. This is the second volume of the season to trace the gospel story in art. Mastroianni, an Italian artist—"the Tissot of sculpture"—has executed a series of modeled wax tableaux relating the passage of events from Bethlehem to Golgotha. Some of his conceptions are poignantly vivid, particularly those dealing with the trial and crucifixion. The preface gives a detailed account of the life of this sculptor, who is not yet 40 years old, but whose sculptured story of Christ has become the crowning work of his career thus far. Inspirational Books Suitable for Gifts

The late well-loved Dr. J. R. Miller is represented at the Christmas season by three little posthumous volumes, each of which has a characteristically helpful message. Things That Endure, The Glory of the Commonplace (each $1 net), and The Secret of Love (50 cents) are published by the Thomas Y. Crowell Company, New York. The first gives valuable advice on the folly of wasting one's time on the unstable things of life; the second will adapt itself readily to young people's societies and other religious meetings; the third, which is illustrated, has for its text "Wherever two lives have learned to live together in love, there is a bit of heaven."

The Attractive Way, by Wilfred T. Grenfell. "I have no message for any man who insists that life is purposeless and fruitless," begins Dr. Grenfell in this charming booklet. "I look upon myself simply as a wayfarer quite capable of losing the way, as I have often done in our Arctic snow fields;" and then he goes on to explain why he thinks the attractive way is to follow Christ. There is a portrait, and the binding is exquisitely dainty. [Pilgrim Press, Boston. 50 cents.

The Quest of the Best: Christian Ethics for Boys, by William De Witt Hyde. Many years of experience and close observation have especially qualified Dr. Hyde to write this book, which has been designed to assist all who are engaged in work with boys, particularly parents and teachers. It contains the frank opinions of a man big enough and far-sighted enough in his ideas to recognize the elements of good in the lad ordinarily termed bad. Every normal boy possesses the instincts of primitive man and must go through a civilizing process before he develops into a desirable member of society. Dr. Hyde maintains that coercion only produces an artificial goodness, real goodness being effected through awakening a recognition of duty to self and society. His book, which is intended for practical women and men, states facts in a direct and common-sense manner. [Thomas Y. Crowell Company, New York. $1.

The Communion of Saints: Thoughts for Every Day Throughout the Christian Year, selected from authors old and new by May Byron. These "thoughts" are chosen from Aristotle, Dante, Epictetus, Bunyan, Emerson, Arnold, Wordsworth, Carlyle and many other lofty sources. The book is bound in amethyst with gold lettering and is printed in red and black. [George H. Doran Company, New York. $1.50.

A Christmas When the Land Was Young, by Cyrus Townsend Brady. Away out in the far western country a man and woman, alone, dig a grave for their little dead child on Christmas eve. How another baby is found in the snow and comes to fill their empty hearts makes a charming story. [A. C. McClurg and Company, Chicago. 50 cents.

Habeeb the Beloved, by William S. Nelson, is a tale of life in modern Syria which demonstrates that even in the "stifling atmosphere of Turkish suspicion and intrigue the most beautiful flower of simple Christian faith and character can strike its roots." Illustrated from photographs. [Westminster Press, Philadelphia. 75 cents.

Thirty Pieces of Silver, by Clarence Budington Kelland. In a vision a brilliant atheistic lecturer, who robs his hearers of their faith for money, is revealed to himself as "an accomplice of Judas." Written without the usual obviousness and well illustrated. [Harper and Brothers, New York. 50 cents.

Various Other Gift Books

The Gathering of Brother Hilarius, by Michael Fairless. A beautiful mediæval tale of the monk Hilarius, by the much-talked-of author of "The Roadmender," said to have been written for a young artist friend "who had not yet learned to hunger and love." It will be just the kind of gift a young reader will appreciate, for it combines romance with its message. Charmingly illustrated in color. [E. P. Dutton and Company, New York. $2.50 net.

Cobb's Bill of Fare: A Companion to "Cobb's Anatomy," by Irvin S. Cobb. Those who like Mr. Cobb's special brand of wit will find numerous opportunities to chuckle or become uproarious here. The bill of fare is divided into four courses—vittles, music, art and sport. The illustrations (which are side-splitting) are furnished by Peter Newell and James Preston. [George H. Doran Company, New York. 75 cents.

Tristan and Isolda: A Dramatic Poem by Richard Wagner, freely translated in poetic narrative form by Oliver Huckel. Dr. Huckel's version is as satisfying a one as we have had in verse, and, being printed and bound with quite unusual care and taste, will make a very appropriate gift for anyone who loves this Wagnerian masterpiece. [Thomas Y. Crowell Company, New York. 75 cents.

Alliterative Anomalies for Infants and Invalids, by John Cowie and William Hammond. A series of expressive color plates amplified by such amazing alliterative captions as "Peppery papa's powerful palm proclaiming parental prerogative" or "Lovelorn lyrist letting loose luxurious language." [Dodd, Mead and Company, New York. $1 net.

Little Shavers: Sketches from Real Life, by J. R. Shaver. Extremely clever and moving line drawings of the paupers and "poor little rich" children of America, suggesting at once Phil May's sketches of lower class life in London. A particularly appealing gift book. [Century Company, New York. $1 net.

The Soul of Melicent, by James Branch Cabell, is a mediæval tale of two lovers whose story is simply a new variation of the immortal Tristram and Iseult, Aucassin and Nicolette. With several superb colored plates by Howard Pyle. [Frederick A. Stokes Company, New York. $1.50 net.

How I Spent My Million: A Christmas Story, by J. Edgar Park. An exceedingly funny account of an amiable but resourceless man's efforts to dispose of a bothersome million dollars. There's a little love story too, and some appropriately ridiculous illustrations. [Pilgrim Press, Boston. 75 cents.

The Cubies' A B C, versed by Mary Mills Lyall; pictured by Earl Harvey Lyall. This is the cleverest burlesque on the cubists that the season has so far produced. The colored pictures are grotesquely funny, the verses really humorous. [G. P. Putman's Sons, New York. $1 net.

A Book of Nonsense, by Edward Lear. It's good to have the famous "Nonsense Book" in this diminutive form. The binding is a deep tone of blue, the illustrations the originals of the first edition. [Frederick A. Stokes Company, New York. $1 net.

Votes for Men is brimful of fun at the expense of the suffragists. An appropriate gift for a not too-serious feminist. [Duffield and Company, New York. 50 cents.

A Bedouin Lover, by William Allen Knight. On a recent visit to Egypt Mr. Knight, author of the memorable "Song of Our Syrian Guest," had the fortune to secure a guide with a romantic love story in his past. He related it to the author and Mr. Knight retells it here in the picturesque language of the Arab. There are colored photographs and the binding is daintily decorated. [Pilgrim Press, Boston. 50 cents.

The Maxims of Noah, by Gelett Burgess, collects various accounts of that ancient sailor, gleaned from Genesis, the Talmud, the Book of Yashar and other Semitic sources, along with epigrammatic utterances coined by that indefatigable Mr. Burgess that he might have uttered, concerning ladies and love and life, having had ample opportunity in his 500 years of bachelorhood to acquire plenty of experiences. [Frederick A. Stokes Company, New York. 80 cents net.

The Changing Year: A Book of Nature Verse, compiled by John R. Howard. Very attractively published, this anthology ought to solve the problem of a gift offering for the lover of outdoors. The editor has been wise in his selections from Arnold to Yeats. Photogravure frontispiece. [Thomas Y. Crowell Company, New York. Cloth, $1 net; leather, $1.50 net.

Abram's Freedom, by Edna Turpin. A delightful little story of a slave who tried to earn his freedom. Will be enjoyed by all those who like a good "darky" story. Bound attractively in paper. [Pilgrim Press, Boston. 50 cents.

For Boys and Girls

Tales for Children from Many Lands is a series edited by F. C. Tilney, the aim of which is to present classic tales that children enjoy in attractive yet inexpensive and convenient-sized editions. Among the first volumes to be issued are Gulliver's Travels, with very effective illustrations in color by Arthur Rackham; English Fairy Tales, edited by Ernest and Grace Rhys, illustrated by Herbert Cole and R. Anning Bell; Fairy Tales from Spain, illustrated by W. Matthews; Robin Hood, illustrated by Ione Railton; and Æsop's Fables, illustrated by F. C. Tilney. All the pictures are in color. [E. P. Dutton and Company, New York. Each 50 cents net.

Snow White and the Seven Dwarfs: A Fairy Tale Play Based on the Story of the Brothers Grimm, by Jessie Braham White; with music by Edward Rickett and numerous illustrations by Charles B. Falls. This volume is uniquely decorated and beautiful and will make an enchanting Christmas gift. The text is the dramatic version used by the Little Theater Company of New York last winter. The colored plates are unusual and tremendously well done. [Dodd, Mead and Company, New York. $2 net.

Really Truly Nature Stories, by Helen S. Woodruff. This book leads the child reader to a knowledge of the "outdoor children" by a rather original approach and is sure to prove captivating. A chapter like "Our Friends the Snakes" is well calculated to remove some of a child's horror about harmless varieties. The information is all given out in informal conversations with a group of boys and girls. Most tastefully bound in delicate blue; illustrated and decorated. [George H. Doran Company, New York. $1 net.

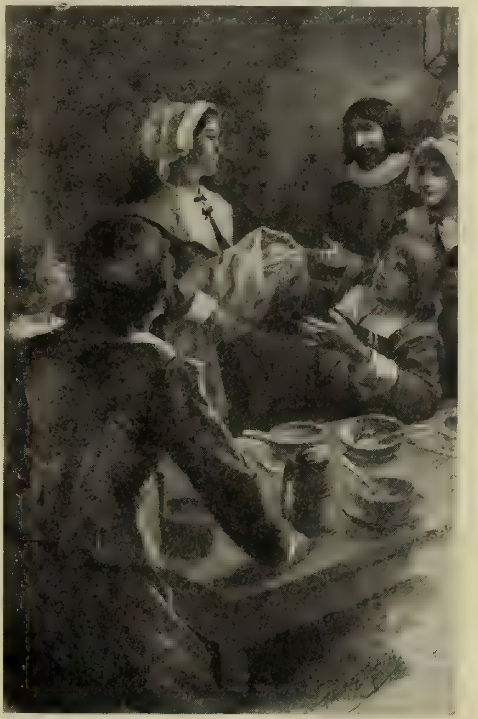
This Year's Book for Boys, by Herbert Strang, Harold Avery, Tom Bevan, Stacey Blake, Desmond Coke, Captain Gilson, Claude Grahame-White and others. Imaginatively and educationally this book has value. It is an "encyclopedia of fun, frolic and interesting stories of adventure, invention and progress," of chivalry, daring deeds, battle at sea, brave self-sacrifice in all parts of the world. There are innumerable illustrations in color and black and white, and the cover inlay is gorgeous. A most acceptable gift. [George H. Doran Company, New York. $1.50 net.

A History of Germany, by H. E. Marshall. A new volume in a series whose design is to tell the history of all the nations for children. The idea is a splendid one and it is being embodied in quartos of elaborate make-up, excellent illustrations in color and fine, large type. The writing is simple and human. [George H. Doran Company, New York. $2.50 net.

Shakespeare's Stories, by Constance and Mary Maud. Lucid, simply written narratives of "As You Like It," "Romeo and Juliet," "Twelfth Night," "Macbeth," "The Tempest," "King Lear," "A Midsummer Night's Dream," "The Merchant of Venice" and "Hamlet." The original dialogue has been retained in prose, whenever it serves the purpose better than some other form. This is the only fitting way to retell Shakespeare. Illustrated. [Longmans, Green and Company, New York. $1.50.

The Peek-a-Boo Japs, drawn by Chloe Preston, with verses by Tom Preston. The Prestons have produced a beautiful book which will delight the youthful fancy. The full-page color plates are as pretty and as piquant as anyone could wish, and the verses flow along with a jolly swing. It's a book that will wake the crossest child out of a fit of blues. One look at the dogs with the polka dot spots should be enough to produce smiles. [George H. Doran Company, New York. $1 net.

A Jolly Jingle Book, by Anna Burnham Bryant. This book puts "in black and white what little children think at night." There are cheery verses aplenty about the circus parade, the Christmas tree, the brownie, the scarecrow, the brook and others that have already delighted youthful magazine readers. Any girl or boy up to 10 or 12 years will enjoy it all immensely. [Pilgrim Press, Boston. $1



From "The Pilgrims' First Christmas"
Copyright, 1913, Pilgrim Press, Boston

The Lady of the Lighthouse, by Helen B. Woodruff. Mrs. Woodruff assures us that there is a real lady of the lighthouse and that this book is inspired by her. Readers of The Continent have read of this kind of "lighthouse" — for the blind, not for mariners—founded by Miss Winifred Holt. The touching story contains accounts of the methods for cheering and helping the blind, all based on fact. The pathos is relieved by the deliciously humorous character of the old colored mammy. [George H. Doran Company, New York. $1.

The Children's Book of Christmas Stories, edited by Asa Don Dickinson and Ada M. Skinner. Here are tales from Dickens, Hans Andersen, the Bible, Mary E. Wilkins Freeman, Katherine Pyle, Robert H. Schauffler, Francois Coppee, Elizabeth Harrison and many others. The binding is appropriately "Christmasy" and the book ought to fill a big need for children, big and little, who want good stories with the Christmas spirit in them. [Doubleday, Page and Company, New York. $1.25.

Nancy in the Wood, by Marion Bryce; illustrated by K. Clausen, is a nature fairy tale with dryads and gnomes, fairy queens, blackbirds, ladybugs, spiders, frogs, squirrels, insects and many other interesting people for its characters. The colored illustrations are very charming; the decorations, too. [John Lane Company, New York. $1 net.

A Spartan Primer, by Key Cammack; pictured by Grace G. Drayton (Grace G. Wiederseim). It's splendid to have at least one book this year with the rollicking Wiederseim kiddies in it. These alphabetical verses tell of the heroic virtues of some hypothetical Spartan youngsters, contrasting them with the modern young pampered person. The drawings are sublimely humorous, as usual. [Duffield and Company, New York. $1 net.

Scott, illustrated by A. G. Walker, is a new volume in the "Children's Poets" series containing many of Scott's shorter poems and ballads and selected passages from "Marmion," "The Lay of the Last Minstrel" and "The Lady of the Lake." Pocket size. [Frederick A. Stokes Company, New York. 45 cents.

Jack and Jill and Other Mother Goose Rhymes, with illustrations by Blanche Fisher Wright. A cunning booklet just the right size to hang on the Christmas tree for a little tot. The pictures are charmingly done. [Rand, McNally and Company, Chicago. 50 cents.

Sunday School Lesson Helps

Peloubet's Select Notes on the International Lessons for 1914, by F. N. Peloubet and Amos R. Wells. It is scarcely necessary to describe this annual publication so welcome to Sunday school teachers throughout the entire English-speaking world. From small beginnings the plan of the work has developed into an ample and comprehensive one. It now furnishes the text of the international lessons both in the accepted version and in the revised version, and supplies the student with lists of most recent and helpful works. The maps and illustrations in the present issue are of the usual high grade. [W. A. Wilde Company, Boston. $1 net.

The Teaching of the Lesson, by G. Campbell Morgan. The great name of Dr. Campbell Morgan will no doubt carry this little pocket commentary into the hands of a multitude of Sunday school teachers. It is a simple and clear exposition. Each lesson is given in the English revised text. Its story is retold in a paragraph and the teaching of it summarized in another paragraph, the whole closing with the golden text. [George H. Doran Company, New York. 25 cents.

The Lesson Handbook, 1914, by Henry H. Meyer and John T. McFarland. This is a concise commentary on the international Sunday school lessons based on the American Standard Bible. It gives the references to the home readings, reprints the lesson text in full and furnishes notes and suggestions for more special study. The Berean series has been issued for many years and has been found very helpful. [Methodist Book Concern, New York.

Tarbell's Teachers' Guide, by Martha Tarbell. This help to the study of the international Sunday school lessons for 1914 presents its usual full and well-arranged selection of material. The test of several years' successful use justifies the commendation of this publication to teachers who are using the uniform lessons. [Fleming H. Revell Company, New York. $1 net.

The Superintendent's Helper, 1914, by Jesse Lyman Hurlbut, is vest-pocket size and contains many useful suggestions for introducing and reviewing the international lessons, blackboard work, etc., as well as ruled pages for attendance of pupils and teachers. Studies of Public Questions

The Story of a Page, by John L. Heaton, is in part a compilation of the important editorials published in The New York World during the nearly thirty years of its ownership by the late Joseph Pulitzer. The book is a history of events in America since May, 1883, under headings such as "True Democracy," "Reaction," "The Bond Ring," "Free Silver," "Imperialism" and "The Long Battle for Reform," all as seen through the editorial columns of a great newspaper. Grover Cleveland, David B. Hill, Charles E. Hughes, Mr. Bryan and Theodore Roosevelt in particular also receive attention. The explanatory and connecting matter is clear and ample, and the whole forms a valuable summary of contemporary history. A frontispiece of Joseph Pulitzer helps to make the volume, as it undoubtedly was intended to be, a memorial of the lifework of a remarkable man. [Harper and Brothers, New York. $2.50 net.

The Open Hearth

The Pan-American Mass Protest

There has been very deep dissatisfaction among the Protestant ministers and church people of Washington growing out of the celebration of the so-called "Pan-American Thanksgiving mass" at St. Patrick's Roman Catholic church. The special celebration was initiated and continued during the administration of President Taft with the President and many other men prominent in the national administration in attendance. The impression created in America, and especially in foreign countries, was that the Thanksgiving mass in St. Patrick's church was the "official" American observance of Thanksgiving Day. Every effort was made to intensify this impression. Romanist publications of this and other countries so commented upon the event. One of the bulletins of the Pan-American Union carried the same idea.

With the advent of the new administration, Protestant ministers of Washington took steps to try to prevent a continuation of the custom the former administration had countenanced. Nearly all the denominational ministers' associations took formal action protesting against the effort that evidently was being made to surround this mass with an "official" atmosphere. The Pastors' Federation, consisting of ministers of all evangelical churches of Washington and vicinity, made the same protest. In addition numerous other societies and associations took similar action, all protesting against the effort to make the celebration "official" in character and urging the nonattendance of the President upon this occasion.

These protests aroused strenuous opposition among the Romanist clergy, and especially those attached to St. Patrick's church. Rev. W. T. Russell, pastor of the church, was quoted in a city paper as saying, "This protest was conceived in ignorance, brought forth in prejudice, and it is too bad the poor, pitiful thing did not die in the borning." If this sentence should not be sufficient to indicate the contempt in which Protestants are held by the Romanist communion, or the position of magnificent superiority from which they view every action or interest that is Protestant, perhaps a further comment made by this same priest in the same interview will reveal it. Being asked a question, "Do you think that the President will be influenced by this protest?" he replied, "What! President Wilson! Is that automobile there impeded by a peanut?"

In view of all these conditions, Protestant people throughout the United States will understand somewhat more clearly the reason for the deep disappointment experienced in Washington when the President refused to heed the protests sent to him not only from the city but from Protestants all over the country, and was present at the Roman Catholic celebration of the mass, instead of the service of his own or some other Protestant church.

American Protestants have prided themselves on their spirit of toleration and kindliness toward the Romanists in their rapid encroachments on our institutions. Perhaps this most recent instance may be another reminder of the perils that menace us from this direction, and will serve to put us more effectively on our guard. X.

Not Flaunting the D. D.'s

In view of the recent discussion of the careless application or excessive use of "D. D.'s," permit me to say that Illinois Synod several years ago discontinued printing this indication of the degree in its reports. We have survived without, I believe, any loss of prestige or dignity. B.

Thinks Poe's Writings Negligible

I have been a reader of your paper for many years and I have never before criticised the paper in public or in private. I do now, however, respectfully ask if it is not amazing that a leading religious journal should, as you did Dec. 4, devote two full pages to an article telling of the first time somebody ever saw Edgar Allan Poe, a writer whose life was given up to dissipation and excesses, and of whom it is generally supposed that much of his matter was penned while he was on the verge of delirium tremens, and all of whose writings the world could well have spared? Besides, who cares whether or not Marion Harland "returned that day from taking a music lesson," etc., or wants a picture covering a fourth of a page showing the house where it took place?

Candidly, dear Continent, if that contribution had been sent you by an unknown writer do you think you would have even read it through before deciding that it was not available? L. A. B.

Unity Through the State University

When so much is being said and written on the subject of Christian unity, it may not be out of place to notice the contribution of the oft-deplored state university toward that end. While the denominational college trains men and women who will in large measure perpetuate the traditions of the denomination, the association of students on the campus of the state university is unquestionably tending toward closer Christian unity. Denominational lines here grow indistinct and almost disappear. Men and women from all churches work together, largely through the Christian associations, for the spiritual culture of their fellow students who make no profession. The average student today cares more for the kingdom of God than for any particular church.

Witness the case of a U. P. girl in attendance at the state university of Colorado. Finding no organization of her denomination, she promptly turned to the Presbyterian Church and united with one of the women's Bible classes. More than that, when the members of the classes were invited to ally themselves with the church she with others signed a "student affiliate membership card," thereby indicating that she was a church member and a Christian and glad to claim the First Presbyterian church of Boulder as her church home during her university course.

The presence of this young lady and of some other United Presbyterians at this university has created a most happy situation in Presbyterian and United Presbyterian circles in the state. As a result of this situation and of the influence of Rev. Perry V. Jenness of Twenty-Third Avenue church, Denver, the U. P. Presbytery of Colorado invited the Presbyterian university pastor to present before it a statement concerning the university work. Looking past all denominational lines the presbytery, after some questions and cordial discussion, directed the appointment of a committee to investigate and to report the best method of practical cooperation with the Presbyterians in the work at the state university. Manifestly it is true in state university circles as elsewhere, that true loyalty to the kingdom of God inevitably looks toward closer Christian unity. Ralph C. McAfee.

What Would Become of the Jobless?

The article by Bruce Barton some time ago is honest, I know, and intended to give a right view of certain prominent business men who have been criticised by the public and the courts for the evil and suffering they are causing society. But Mr. Barton's ideas if emulated by the business world would be the means of increasing the wrongs instead of mitigating them.

Mr. Barton gives us the high ideal of one young man who has under his control 7,500 men. It seems to be his aim, which he is ever striving to attain, to take 2,500 of these 7,500 men and so train them and increase their efficiency that they can do the same work that the 7,500 are now doing and turn the remaining 5,000 out into the world to seek other vocations; many would fail, as they know no other business or profession. The majority of these 5,000 would be doomed to disappointment. Now, Mr. Barton never gives us even a hint as to what to do with the 5,000 that he would take away from their jobs, depriving their families of support. It is following such ideals that has put the world into the dilemma it is in today. For ten years almost all businesses have been pooling their interests, turning out hundreds and thousands of men, so that they could increase their dividends and also increase the salaries of the small number of men they retained in their employ; but they do not seem to care for the thousands they have turned out to seek employment elsewhere. I do not think that this man told Mr. Barton the real reason he wanted to look after the interests of the one-third of those under his supervision. I would like to ask this man why he is so interested in the 2,500 and not in the 5,000. If a man commanding a salary of $25,000 as manager can so manipulate operations as to decrease the working force two-thirds and yet take care of the same amount of business, thus lessening operating expenses, he would at the same time be gradually increasing the dividends and probably increasing his own salary from $25,000 to $50,000 a year.

The economic question is a great problem and the church is wrestling with it as never before. The political parties have not solved it. It cannot be corrected by looking well after one-third of the race and turning the other two-thirds out to die. The only solution was given us by our Saviour: We must be our brother's keeper and we must treat each man as our brother and not cause some to prosper at the cost of others. M. L. Branham.

Deplores the Sunday Chautauqua

The time has come—it arrived ten years ago—when the church should do away with the Sunday chautauqua. The writer has been studying and watching it for a dozen years and is confident that in that period Sabbath desecration has increased fourfold in this country; should it continue a dozen years longer with no abatement it will have blotted out and destroyed our American Sabbath. During the last twelve years I know of no one institution, indeed of no half-dozen institutions, for the period of time it runs—it is not open all the year, thank God!—that has done more to weaken, demoralize, debase and destroy our Sabbath than this great calamity, the Sunday chautauqua. Watch it in its mode of action, its subtlety, deceit and its greed, and you will realize that this statement is absolutely true. People fail to realize that it is an institution for making money. Just as the Sunday picture show, Sunday baseball and such like debasing institutions exist to coin money for their projectors, so the Sunday chautauqua is placed before the public to make money for its backers and owners.

The Sunday chautauqua has succeeded in deadening the thought of the people by its false assertions and claims. To an alarming degree has it secularized and commercialized our American Sabbath; its clientele and patronage come largely from the better or higher walks of life, hence its greater opportunity to do and work evil. Many persons thoughtlessly will attend a Sabbath lecture or "sacred" concert under the auspices of the chautauqua who would be ashamed to be caught at a Sunday picture show or at a Sunday baseball game. Thus by their influence they set an example for those occupying the lower walks of life who are not able to pay 50 cents for the Sunday lecture or a concert to attend the Sunday moving picture show for a nickel. Ministers of the gospel have been bribed and prevailed upon for a season ticket to close their churches and Sunday schools and attend Sunday lectures on "The Trusts" or like catchy subjects and at night attend the sacred(?) concert. I heard one minister say that the concert was nothing more than a veiled, refined vaudeville performance.

But the friends of the Sunday chautauqua say, "Look at the great men, high in the life of the nation, who defend and praise the Sunday chautauqua." Well, these men who defend the institution are receiving large sums of money from the Sunday chautauqua for delivering lectures or addresses; while they were praising the Sunday chautauqua the jingle of the dollars in their pockets lulled their conscience to sleep and the devil spoke the words of defense. In the next place many of our leading men have no fixed religious principles. They have no regard for God's holy day, and not much for him. This we find from the top to the bottom. It does look as if the world is determined to recrucify "The Prince of Peace" and that on a "cross of gold." J. P. L. Weems.

Cleveland Churches May Advertise

The 200 Protestant churches of Cleveland, Ohio, have under consideration through the federated churches a plan to advertise in the local papers. The Euclid Avenue Baptist church has led in the campaign by filling every pew in the church through publicity.

THE BOARD OF MISSIONS FOR FREEDMEN

NOTES FROM THE LAST GENERAL ASSEMBLY

Within recent years a few big men both in the South and the North have heard that cry which has echoed down the centuries, "How can I, except some man teach me?" and they have attacked the great task of education with a statesman's vision and an enterprise worthy of captains of industry in the business world. They have classed this undertaking as "big business." The task of furnishing a trained leadership is being bravely attempted by our board within the limitation of their available resources. Every intelligent student of the problem must realize how supremely important is this phase of the work. It may fairly be said that the men who have been trained in our Presbyterian institutions are in the forefront of the Negro leaders of their people, in stability of Christian character and efficiency of Christian service. We must remember that we have had 1,000 years of Christian culture back of us, while these people have only had fifty years. A careful student of history will hesitate to say that our race made as much progress in fifty years, 1,000 years ago, as this race has made in the last half century.

We must be patient with them. We come now to a truly serious inquiry as to what the church is doing to finance this "big business." Let the fact be emphasized that during the year the Negro churches and schools gave for the work among their own people the sum of $147,000; that is to say, 30,000 communicants and adherents gave two-thirds as much for this work as the whole denomination of a million and a third gave to help them last year. All honor to the increasing vigor of the Negro people in their very fruitful labors for self-evangelization. It is true that the vast dimensions of the task stagger us. There was a day long ago when the Master looked out upon the multitude and had compassion on them because they were as sheep without a shepherd and said to his disciples, "What shall we do that they may have bread?" Then they offered their easy solution, "Send them away." How many have suggested that same solution of this problem? Send them to Liberia, to colonies in Africa. But the MASTER answers us today as he answered them then, "They need not depart; give ye them to eat." Fear and faith are mutually exclusive things; as fear comes in faith goes out. Our cowardice in the face of this stupendous task betrays our lack of faith in God.

—Rev. Howard Agnew Johnston, D. D.

THE JUBILEE YEAR

Fifty years of freedom have demonstrated the power of the Negro race to adjust itself to new conditions and to make remarkable progress, but there are still over 1,000,000 colored children for whom there are no schools nor school teachers. Thirty per cent of the people are still illiterate. There is only one educated colored minister for every 30,000 colored people. The Jubilee year of universal liberty in America presents a fitting opportunity for a deepening of interest in the Freedmen's cause.

ALICE LEE ELLIOTT SCHOOL

Rev. W. H. Carroll, principal of the Alice Lee Elliott School, writes: "I wish you could see the fine lot of boys and girls we have here—seventy-four students, thirty-nine girls and thirty-five boys—the largest number the school has ever had this time of the year."

During the first four or more weeks of the term all the available student help is busily employed gathering in the crop of cowpeas, potatoes, corn and cotton. As soon as the crops have been gathered the long campaign for the year's supply of wood in the timber has to be undertaken.

If the necessary materials are on hand this is the golden time to start also the older and best trained boys on the permanent improvement work outlined for the year, such as fence building, sprouting, clearing of new lands, the construction of conveniences for the school, home or farm, the repair of old and erection and painting of new buildings and finally the preparation of the ground and planting of crops for the next year.

MARY HOLMES SEMINARY, WEST POINT, MISS.

Last school year was the very best we have spent in West Point. The small building, fitted up for Domestic Science, with model kitchen, dressmaking room, pantry and closet, added greatly to the efficiency of our industrial training. Pupils of the higher grades entered upon the new work with enthusiasm, and the lower grade pupils, not being overcrowded as formerly, made better progress in the sewing room in the main building. The friends who gave special gifts to meet the expense of fitting up this building, and those who contributed towards the salary of our Domestic Science teacher, may well feel repaid for their generosity.

A graduating class of seven good students completed their course last May, and went out well equipped to lead helpful lives.

In February's special services ten girls became earnest Christians. As a rule, fully nine-tenths of our pupils are professed Christians.

One of our graduates recently wrote: "I am teaching at home again this term, and know that I am doing great good. Now they are making a beautiful progress. . . . I was the main Sabbath school teacher in my church last year; they are talking of making me superintendent."

Some special needs should be met if we would increase the efficiency of our work:

1. More scholarship aid.
2. A new chapel; our present assembly hall is overcrowded and on any public occasion it is totally inadequate.
3. Bedrooms are overcrowded—four pupils in rooms none too large for two. With a new chapel building secured we could put additional bedrooms in the second story and place only two in each bedroom.

Rev. Edgar F. Johnston, D. D.

GREETINGS TO THE WOMEN, THE YOUNG PEOPLE, THE SABBATH SCHOOLS

of our Presbyterian Church, U. S. A.,

May we call your attention to the great need in our Freedmen field for NEW Salaries, NEW Scholarships and NEW buildings? Hundreds of these people have to be turned away because of lack of these. Should such opportunities be lost, when YOU enjoy such rich blessings through the Great CHRISTMAS GIFT?

Will you not help this race to know JESUS is their SAVIOUR too? If your hearts are moved to compassion for these multitudes, we have many interesting things to tell you. You can gather many sheaves for the Master here.

Write us for FACTS. Cordially,

Susan L. Storer, Secretary.

OFFERINGS

The General Assembly recommends the month of DECEMBER for offerings to this cause.

LITERATURE

Write to the Board for the Jubilee Service prepared for the use of Sabbath schools. Programs for Young People's Societies, literature, maps, stereopticon slides, etc.

ANNUITIES

Persons having funds which they plan to have go to the Lord's cause, and yet need the income while they live, may give any sum now and the Board will pay interest upon it during the person's life. Interest paid semi-annually.

THE FORM OF BEQUEST

I give, devise and bequeath unto "The Board of Missions for Freedmen of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America," the sum of .... Dollars, to be expended for appropriate objects of said corporation.

OFFICERS OF THE BOARD

Rev. S. J. Fisher, D. D.	President
Rev. E. P. Cowan, D. D.	Corresponding Secretary and Treasurer
Rev. John M. Gaston	Associate Secretary
Mrs. Susan L. Storer	Secretary Woman's Department

Ways of Working

Three Months Preparing for "White Gift" Christmas

First church, Fort Scott, Kan., Rev. James A. Smith pastor, began last October preparing for Christmas exercises. A series of sermons was arranged under the general subjects of "White Gifts from the King" and "White Gifts for the King." A circular letter sent to members of the church gave a large number of ways in which "white gifts" of self and service could be made by every member of the church and its various organizations.

Help Postmen with Autos

Here is a way to lend a hand at Christmas time. The Presbyterian minister of a Southern California church saw that the postmen were overburdened with bundles one Christmas and decided that on the next occasion he would try to better conditions. So a little telephoning around to parishioners who owned automobiles resulted in several volunteering their services. The machines followed the men on their rounds and made the day a little merrier for them by lightening their loads.

Interesting the Women in Missions

Pictures from missionary countries clipped from The Continent and other papers were recently used as place cards at a luncheon of women in a small city church. The pictures were pasted on cardboard and trimmed closely. At the bottom the name of the guest was written. The place cards provoked discussion and stimulated interest in mission fields thus represented.

A Novelty in Advertising

Immanuel church, Milwaukee, Wis., recently issued a novel advertising card announcing its midweek services. A facsimile, with interlinear translation, of the opening of the book of Isaiah in the original composed the principal part of the card. This undoubtedly gave many members of the church their first idea of the way in which the original of the Bible was written.

Advertises for Traveling Men

First church, Joplin, Mo., Dr. W. M. Cleaveland pastor, advertises in The Gideon, the organ of the traveling men, in order to reach the many traveling men who spend Sunday in Joplin. The men of the church also see that every visitor at hotels gets an invitation to attend services. Street car cards and electric signs are also used to good advantage in attracting men.

Articles to Come

On this page there will be published soon after the first of the year a series of brief articles on church finance by Rev. Otis G. Dale. Mr. Dale has had large success in increasing the offerings of congregations under his charge in several cities. He will give brief, explicit directions for each step to be taken in modernizing the finances of a church. These articles will be worth reading and keeping.

Printer's Ink Aids Lewistown Crusade

Half-page advertisements in local papers figured in the campaign which not long ago drove a regulated vice district from Lewistown, Mont., and so changed the sentiment of the town that the district has remained closed for the three months since the culmination of the fight. The tactics of the campaign in Atlanta, Ga., which were recounted in The Continent several months ago, were used, and much of the same material was given to the people of Lewistown through the papers. Other material for the "ads" was collected by Rev. E. W. Wright, Presbyterian pastor.

In the spring of 1912 business interests demanded the removal of the red light resorts from the heart of the city. The Men and Religion Movement opportunely gave impetus to the forming of men's clubs in leading Protestant churches which vigorously demanded not only the removal but the abolition of the district. The victory was easy, but superficial. The district was abolished, but the solid business opinion of the town was that the social evil could be regulated but not eradicated. The enormous influx of laborers, restless transients, due to the phenomenal development of the section, seemed to give weight to the argument of the "necessary evil." The flooding of the rooming houses with immoral characters further supported the argument. The "segregation" of vice was advocated, as a cure for intolerable conditions. With the tacit consent of the city administration, property was bought for a new red light district several blocks in extent and houses were opened and the building of others was contracted for. This was the situation in this city last June.

Then the church men went into action. A civic league was formed. A campaign of education was entered upon. Mass meetings, advertisements in the newspapers, petitions backed by massed delegations of men when presented to the city council, together with a dispassionate study of the whole vice problem, were the features of the fight. The result was a sweeping victory. The houses were closed; a new ordinance was drawn up, putting rooming houses under rigid police control; the police department and city attorney's office set to work with a vim to stamp out vice; and, perhaps most important, a public sentiment has been crystallized among business men and other citizens which has led the most indifferent to say, "It is plain that this question has now been settled in Lewistown for all time."

Of great weight were the Chicago and Minneapolis vice commission reports; the Atlanta antivice campaign literature, the recent Minnesota state law prohibiting vice districts anywhere in the state, and the general literature on the white slave traffic. Local factors were: Fearless Christian laymen, a high standard of intelligent American citizenship, the activity in municipal office of men too big and clean to be corrupted by bribery, a Christian city attorney and a police chief with a high reputation; a woman's club given to the discussion of grave social problems, and a church sentiment wide awake to the leadings of the "new conscience" in matters social and political.

The Swift Flight of the Years

The swift flight of the years is measured by consciousness as well as upon calendars. A year is a cycle to a child, while a lifetime upon earth is but a handbreadth to the aged.

A beautiful Art Calendar for 1914 has been prepared showing the flight of the days on the background of a glory reflected in the face of an old Scotch Minister surrounded by his fellow-elders. If you want to measure the swift flight of your years by this radiant rule, a complimentary copy of the calendar will be mailed you, post paid, for the asking. Send your name and address today, as the edition is limited.

THE FIELD OF CHRISTIAN EFFORT

LIQUOR MEN PLAN TO OPPOSE SUNDAY

Every effort is being made by the Allegheny County Liquor Dealers' Protective Association to prevent "Billy" Sunday and his Pittsburg evangelistic campaign from doing harm to the liquor business. Sunday afternoon, Dec. 7, 2,000 persons directly or indirectly interested in the liquor business met in the Lyceum theater, Pittsburg, to hear an address by C. A. Windle of Chicago, editor of The Iconoclast, on "How to Answer Sunday and Refute His Statements Concerning the Liquor Business." The letter of invitation urging liquor dealers to attend was in part as follows.

"A movement of gigantic character antagonistic to the entire liquor industry in the state has been inaugurated and will be encouraged by the opening of 'Billy' Sunday's eight weeks' religious revival which will begin in Pittsburg Dec. 28. This revival is one of a series that will be conducted throughout the state by this fellow, who to a certain extent is poisoning the minds of the people against our business and all engaged in it by his clownish antics and lying tirade of abuse and vituperation delivered during these revival meetings.

"We insist that you, Mr. Liquor Dealer, who with your family will be the target of this fellow's abuse, should set aside everything and attend an important meeting that will be addressed by C. A. Windle of Chicago, who is fully equipped with an abundance of facts and ably qualified to express them in defense of our business and against the absurd fallacies preached by this clown and fanatic, 'Billy' Sunday."

It was intended that the meeting should be secret, but somehow the newspaper men got the tip, obtained full information and exploited it the next morning in the daily papers. This action on the part of the enemies of this movement, say ministers, has done more to break down opposition, restrain criticism and make friends for Mr. Sunday than anything the churches or ministers have been able to do.

THE CHURCH AND THE COMMUNITY

Ohio—Moving pictures will be shown in Massillon church each Friday evening according to the announcement of the pastor, Rev. S. W. Fraser.

Illinois—The boys of one of the classes of Bushnell Sunday school are considering ways and means of starting a gymnasium.—Four manual training outfits have been installed in Emerson Street church, Evanston, where boys are learning practical work under volunteer instructors of the community.

New Jersey—A social survey of New Brunswick churches shows that 30 per cent of the membership of local churches consists of men, 55 per cent of women. Of the seventeen churches which reported most gave motion picture shows as their greatest competitors. Other competitors in order of importance were lodges, theaters, saloons, pool rooms, ball grounds and dance halls. Fifty per cent of the Sunday school teachers are women and only 23 per cent of Sunday school pupils are men or boys.

Iowa—The church at Cross Lanes near Fairfield is holding a series of entertainments for the country residents in connection with the holidays. A special school in the basement of the church has been opened under a little used state law for the older boys and girls of the community who have been deprived of other educational advantages. It is hoped by the people of the vicinity that this will be the forerunner of a township high school.—A series of country life conferences has been held during the past two weeks at Anamosa, Monticello, Castle Grove, Amber, Scotch Grove, Center Junction, Bethel church and Onslow. Dr. Warren H. Wilson of the Home Board, Rev. M. B. McNutt, President E. E. Reed of Lenox College, Dr. J. F. Hinkhouse of Fairfield, Iowa, and other experts, together with local pastors, conducted the meetings, which were continued for two days at each center. Addresses and discussions for all classes of people were held on subjects relating to country life by the leaders.

Daily Service for Children

A daily chapel for public school students is being held by Rev. F. L. Selden in Ravenswood church, Chicago. Meetings were begun this fall and continued for fifteen minutes just before school begins in the morning. The children of several denominations stop at the church on the way to school and have a brief service. Verses and a hymn are committed to memory each week. There are also singing, Bible reading and prayer. Nearly fifty children gather every morning.

Dr. Carroll with Federal Council

At the meeting of the executive committee of the Federal Council in Baltimore Dec. 3 to 5, Dr. Henry King Carroll, who was long corresponding secretary of the missionary society of the Methodist Episcopal Church and is famous as the most authoritative compiler of church statistics in the United States, was named associate secretary of the council, to reside in Washington and promote moral legislation in Congress as well as look after the interests of the council in all the Southern states.

CHURCH EFFICIENCY HINTS

Wisconsin—Plans have been made for a survey of Oshkosh by Charles Stelzle under the direction of the local ministerial association.

Texas—Following a long period of preparation, nearly 2,800 people, including a large number of Catholics, joined in the religious canvass recently taken in San Antonio.

Iowa—A recent house-to-house canvass of Cedar Falls by the Sunday school forces has stirred up great interest in Sunday school work. The canvass was made in two hours.

Ohio—Evergreen church, Youngstown, in an every-member canvass recently increased current expense pledges from $45 weekly to $92. The pastor, Rev. W. C. Press, has been in demand among his fellow presbyters at men's gatherings telling how it was done.

Colorado—Efficiency methods are being urged on the churches of Boulder and Denver Presbyteries by the pastor-evangelist, Rev. C. K. Powell. It is suggested that the campaign should start with a systematic visitation of every home in the parish with a study of the institutional and social life and other facts bearing upon local conditions. An evangelistic campaign followed with a campaign to interest everyone in systematic giving is also part of the plan.

COLORADO FARMERS GIVE THANKS

The agriculturist of El Paso county, Colorado, W. H. Lauck, a live Methodist, acting in conjunction with a committee from the Ministerial Alliance of Colorado Springs, the county school association, the county commissioners and the chamber of commerce, arranged to call the people of the county, whether in city, town or country, together at 11 o'clock Thanksgiving day. Meetings were to be held in the churches where there were any; where none, then in schoolhouses in country and village. The ministers of Colorado Springs were sent out to preach. Ten autos in addition to the train service took them to their places, often accompanied by singers from the churches. At each meeting place in country and village a picnic dinner was served and the afternoon given over to a discussion of farming. The attendance was large.

The new $22,000 building at Rockwell City, Iowa, where in five years the membership has grown from 161 to 281, dedicated Nov. 23.

AND IN A LIQUOR STRONGHOLD

The movement to clean up Peoria, Ill., of its wide open vice is progressing. A Law Enforcement League has been formed, a committee of five secured to lead out in the open, back of whom is a committee of 100 Peoria business men from all walks of life and back of these in turn are the best Christian citizens of the city. The ministers are active in keeping the matter before their congregations and molding popular opinion. Definite results have already begun to show themselves.

THE Y. M. C. A. AND ITS ACTIVITIES

Peking, China—The new Y. M. C. A. building given by John Wanamaker was recently opened by ceremonies in which President Yuan Shih Kai took a leading part.

Port Alegra, Brazil—Advanced classes in English at the association building are attended by young business men, a banker and two lieutenants of the army college.

Colleges Raise Their Standing

Eight Presbyterian colleges which a year ago had not met the requirement of the standard adopted by General Assembly have now qualified. Other institutions are making vigorous efforts to supply what is lacking and according to officials of the College Board all the things still needed can be supplied by additional funds. The committee engaged in the task of classifying Presbyterian institutions under the standard adopted by General Assembly recently met in Chicago to formulate a report which will not be completed until Assembly meets in May. The committee is composed of Presidents Hinitt of Center College, chairman; Black of Missouri Valley College, Hawley of Henry Kendall College and Dr. J. E. Clarke of the board.

Advertisements Instead of Revival Series

Instead of planning a revival series the ministers of Connellsville, Pa., have decided to use a large display space in the local newspapers each Saturday urging Christian living. It is expected that the experiment will be continued for three months. Nine local churches are participating.

FIRST GENERAL ASSEMBLY MET HERE

Second Church, Philadelphia, Remembers Former Days—Cigarettes Cause Downfall of Majority of Criminals, Says Director Porter.

PHILADELPHIA—Second church, Rev. Alexander MacColl pastor, observed its 170th anniversary on a recent Sunday. It was signalized by the addition to the endowment fund by a member of $25,000. The history of Second church is contemporaneous with most of the city's life. Its organization was the result of the great Whitefield revival of the eighteenth century. Its first pastor was the noted Gilbert Tennent. When Mr. Tennent was soliciting funds to build a church he asked Benjamin Franklin for the names of those on whom he might call and Franklin told him to "call on everybody." With the Second church met the first General Assembly in America, that of 1789.

Call Arch Street Pastor—Arch Street church has unanimously chosen to succeed Dr. Mervin J. Eckels as pastor Rev. Clarence E. McCartney, pastor of First church, Paterson, N. J. Dr. Eckels is seeking recuperation at the home of a sister in Carlisle, Pa., his native place.

Observe Double Anniversary — Olney church, which has had a most encouraging growth under its first and only pastor, Rev. W. H. Wells, and has a present membership of 415 with 550 in the Sunday school, at the celebration of the fifteenth anniversary of both church and minister enjoyed sermons from Doctors W. P. Lee of Germantown and J. B. Laird of Frankford. On presbyterial night R. Montgomery, C. E. Burns, J. H. Boggs, H. W. Bloch and M. S. Bush spoke. Moderator McCrone presided.

Brief Items—Dr. Stone of Chicago, moderator of General Assembly, will speak to the elders of Philadelphia North Feb. 20.—The Philadelphia Sabbath Association, which is very actively engaged in measures for the promotion of Sabbath observance, held its seventy-fourth anniversary in First Church of the Covenanters.—Downtown business men have organized to continue the recent noon hour Bible conferences in a vacant storeroom.—The ministers' December social union at the Bellvue-Stratford had present Dr. Thomas H. Law, stated clerk of the Southern General Assembly. The meeting was addressed by Dr. Oliver Huckel of Baltimore, his subject being "Literature and Life."—A bill poster company has announced to ministers of the city that during December in the desire to inaugurate an "uplift movement for the good of humanity by turning their minds to noble and inspiring thoughts," it will display on its boards a great masterpiece depicting the birth of Christ.—The woman's December home and foreign mission societies of Philadelphia presbyteries were addressed by Mrs. D. E. Waid, Miss Dwight E. Potter and Dr. Stanley White, all of New York.—Paschall Avenue U. P. church, which has changed its name to Woodland Avenue, Rev. H. R. Galloway pastor, has purchased and occupied the former Union Presbyterian church. It rededicated the edifice Dec. 7.

Personal Notes—William T. Tilden, elder in Wakefield church, Germantown, has been elected president of the Union League for the third successive term and General Louis Wagner, elder of Market Square church, Germantown, has been reelected chairman of the board of city trusts.—Director of Public Safety Porter, an elder in West Side church, Germantown, in an address at First church said that the downfall of more than 75 per cent of the criminals arrested could be traced to the cigarette habit.—Dr. John R. Davies, pastor of Bethlehem church, was invited to preach to the "efficiency conference" of more than 500 M. E. ministers.

Bible Classes Gather—The first winter rally of the Drexel Biddle Bible classes of Philadelphia and Camden was held in Richardson Memorial church. A dozen denominations were represented by a large number of ministers and leaders in social and business life.

W. P. White.

GET SPECIAL WORKER FOR BOHEMIANS

OMAHA—The Bohemian population of Omaha and South Omaha now has a special worker, Miss Anna Kvapil. She was fitted for her work in the Coraopolis Missionary Training School. This effort is made possible by the Home Board.

Hold Two Weeks' Meetings—Parkvale church has been strengthened in attendance and membership by two weeks' gospel meetings. Local ministers assisted the pastor, Rev. A. E. Lehmann.

Reception for New Pastor—Westminster having installed its pastor, J. Frank Young, D. D., tendered him and his family a reception Dec. 8. A mothers' club has been organized with a purpose of encouraging mothers to assist their children more intelligently in their Sunday school graded lesson work.

Personal Items—The resignation of Rev. B. A. Filipi from the Bohemian church brings regret to Presbyterians of the city. For seven years this pastor has devoted himself with fine consecration to his parish. Despite the difficulties of the field fifty members have been received and the Sunday school doubled.—The Omaha Ministers' Association, interdenominational, has elected Grant E. Fisher, D. D., pastor at Dundee, president for the coming year.

Have Bazar Downtown—The rotunda of the Bee building is tendered each December to the city churches for bazars. Churches are accommodated in cycles of four, for two days each. Six Presbyterian churches are in the schedule for this year: Lowe Avenue, Covenant, Parkvale, North, Benson and Clifton Hill.

WOULD CLEANSE ROLLS OF CHURCHES

Presbytery Urges Discipline of Those Who Sign Saloon Petitions—Pittsburg Churches Have Been Self-Supporting for Third of a Century.

PITTSBURG—The December meeting of Pittsburg Presbytery was held in Second church Dec. 9. Items of interest were the adoption of rigid resolutions urging pastors and sessions to discipline members who sign petitions for the granting of license, or act as attorneys for those trying to secure license, or who own and rent property for immoral purposes, or in any way receive revenue from commercialized vice. Presbytery adopted the overture approving the plan of union with the Reformed Church and negatived the Cincinnati overture asking that the name of the Board of Missions for Freedmen be changed to the Board of Missions for Negroes in the United States. Mention was made of the fact that Dr. George Montgomery had just completed his fifth year as superintendent of missions in the presbytery and that Oct. 7 was the thirty-third anniversary of Pittsburg as a self-supporting presbytery. During the past year it expended $90,000 on its own work and is asking for $100,000 the coming year.

Mrs. Colgate Speaks—The Waldensian Society of Pittsburg met in the Twentieth Century club rooms Dec. 9. Addresses were made by Mrs. Gilbert Colgate of New York, who has just returned from a tour of the Waldensian church in Italy, and Dr. John K. McClurkin, president of the Pittsburg organization.

How Long Should Pastorate Be?—Dr. George M. Kerr, who has been pastor of Raccoon church for more than forty years, read a very interesting paper before the Ministers' Association Dec. 8 on "Long and Short Pastorates." Dr. Kerr deplored the "whirlwind campaigns and then on to another church" methods of so many ministers, and cited a a number of specific cases to prove that the men who had done thorough work and made a lasting impression on the communities in which they labored were almost always the men who stayed for a generation or more.

Personal Notes—Rev. Harry C. Hutchison has been called to First church of Aspinwall.—Rev. H. M. Forsythe has declined a call to First church, Altoona.—Rev. S. W. McKelvey will be installed pastor of Second church, Wilkinsburg, Jan. 16.

HAS CONGREGATION OF LITTLE FOLK

NEW JERSEY—Rev. Shackelford Daugherty, pastor of Columbus church, has organized a juvenile congregation with a full set of little officials. The service is held just before the sermon to adults and is a perfect model of the larger service.

Brief Items—Princeton University and Seminary will send twenty men to the convention of student volunteers to be held in Kansas City Dec. 31 to Jan. 4.—Work has begun on the new church building at Franklin to be completed in the early summer.—S. Hall Young, D. D., pioneer Alaskan missionary and at present superintendent of Alaskan missions, is speaking almost every day. Last week he was at Madison Avenue church, Elizabeth, addressing the brotherhood; at South Orange, and at Westfield, where he adddressed the Christian Endeavorers of Union county at a missionary dinner given in the Westfield church.

Women Celebrate—The twenty-fifth anniversary of the women's home missionary society of the Madison Avenue church, Elizabeth, was celebrated Dec. 12. The widow of the first pastor, Rev. A. L. Clark, took part. Mrs. C. G. Reynolds, wife of the present pastor, is president

Men's Work—One of the biggest and best brotherhoods in New Jersey is that of Flemington church. At the monthly dinners laymen of wide reputation, and never ministers, are asked to speak. The last speaker, Dec. 16, was C. H. Dressman, Y. M. C. A. secretary at Trenton.—A magnificent Y. M. C. A. building was dedicated Dec. 7 at Morristown. Rev. John McDowell, pastor of Park church, Newark, was the principal speaker.

There are 29,000 Sunday school pupils in the churches and missions of the United States under Presbyterian auspices where a foreign language is spoken.

Rev. W. W. Courtice, pastor of St. Peter, Minn., church, has been given a vacation because of ill health until April 1.

War Against Vice Pushed Vigorously Past Year—Mission Educators to Gather—Many Red Cross Seals Sold by Mail.

NEW YORK—Four meetings were held in Y. M. C. A. auditoriums in Manhattan and Brooklyn Dec. 7 to celebrate the fortieth anniversary of the New York Society for the Suppression of Vice, with which the name of Anthony Comstock is indelibly connected. The association was founded in 1873 by William E. Dodge, Morris K. Jessup, J. Pierpont Morgan, Robert R. McBurney, Cephas Brainerd and twelve other men, all connected with the Y. M. C. A., with which the organization was originally affiliated. During the past twelve months 864 persons have been arraigned before federal courts, and 2,743 in state courts. Fines amounting to $235,030 have been imposed, and in the last three months alone more than three tons of obscene books have been destroyed.

Many Will Dine — The Missionary Education Movement has announced Jan. 13 as the date for its third annual dinner at the Hotel Astor. This dinner is for the members, officers and friends of the home and foreign missions members of the United States and Canada and over 500 persons from all parts of the continent and from all denominations are expected. Among the speakers announced are Dr. John R. Mott, Principal Alfred Gandier of Knox College, Toronto, J. Campbell White and Secretary J. Ernest McAfee of the Home Board.

Gospel Mission Calls for Funds—The Gospel Mission to the Tombs, of which Dr. David G. Wylie is president and James Yereance treasurer, has sent out an appeal for funds. The association has conducted services in the chapel of the Tombs for over fifty years and its chaplain has visited the prisoners in their cells, carrying them Bibles and reading matter.

Secretary Bryan Speaks to Ministers—Secretary of State Bryan addressed the meeting of the clerical conference of the Federation of Churches last Wednesday afternoon in the assembly hall of the Metropolitan Life building.

Dr. Adam to Continue in Rutgers — Dr. John Douglas Adam, who has been supplying Rutgers church, has agreed to continue as stated supply until the end of March. He will give the church at present, however, no encouragement in inquiries as to whether he will accept a call. The faculty of Hartford Theological Seminary has requested Dr. Adam to add two more hours a week to his present lectures there.

To Prepare Mission Text Book—Miss Jean Mackenzie has returned from the Presbyterian mission on the west coast of Africa and has offered her resignation to the board after ten years of brilliant service. Miss Mackenzie is engaged to prepare for the united mission study course of the Women's Foreign Missionary Boards a text book on Africa for next season's study.

Brief Items—At the recent anniversary exercises of the Church of the Covenant of the fourteen original officers eight were present who had served the church the whole twenty years of its existence. —Dr. Robert E. Speer is the Presbyterian representative at the complimentary dinner to Dr. Edward Judson, which is to be held tonight. The dinner is also in celebration of the centenary of Dr. Judson's father, the famous missionary, Adoniram Judson.—The Y. W. C. A. of Brooklyn held on Dec. 12 in the First Reformed church a membership banquet, the first of several entertainments designed to double the membership of the association before the new building is ready.—The Boys' Brigade of Bethany church, Brooklyn, Rev. Louis O. Rotenbach pastor, held an entertainment Dec. 12, the proceeds of which were used to start a fund for uniforms.

Stony Brook Assembly Elects Officers — The Stony Brook Assembly held its annual meeting last week in Central church, Brooklyn. Resolutions were adopted authorizing the incorporation of the assembly, and officers were chosen as follows: Dr. John F. Carson, president; Dr. David G. Wylie and James Yereance, vice presidents; Rev. Reid Dickson, secretary. Thirty directors, half ministers and half laymen, were also elected.

Red Cross Seals in New York—Dec. 7 was observed in many churches as Tuberculosis Day. Special pamphlets describing the war carried on against the white plague were distributed in many congregations. The Red Cross seal committee reports that nearly $9,000 has been received in mail orders alone in the city, and more than $13,000 worth of seals are on sale in various places throughout Manhattan and the Bronx.

Open Fort Washington Church—The new Fort Washington church, Dr. D. H. Martin pastor, was formally opened last Sunday. Dr. Martin preached the opening sermon and Dr. Anthony H. Evans and Dr. Anson P. Atterbury, pastors of West-Park church, of which the Fort Washington is a branch, also took part. William J. Campbell of the board of trustees of West church gave a brief history of the congregation, while Colonel W. G. Green of the committee of construction told of the work. The keys of the church were formally turned over to the congregation by Thomas P. Spencer of the building committee and were accepted by Elder William S. Bennett, who is also clerk of the session. The structure cost $321,000. The pastor, who came from Glens Falls two months ago, will be installed Dec. 19.

Ministers Discuss Work for Boys—With Rev. Joseph H. Hollister of First church as one of the prime movers, the ministers of Mount Vernon, including the Catholic priest, met last week to discuss the great need for an organized work among boys and young men in that town. There is no Y. M. C. A. and the only work for boys is being carried on by a few of the churches, among which the First church is prominent. It was under Mr. Hollister's supervision that the remarkably successful boys' conference was held last year in Mount Vernon. A council was appointed with Mr. Hollister secretary which will appoint a committee to consider aggressive work for boys.

CITY INVITES EVERYONE TO CHURCH

Special Effort to Swell Number of Worshipers—Plan to Have Structures Open on Week Days—Old Church in New Use.

LOS ANGELES—Churches of all denominations observed go-to-church Sunday recently. Plans for a house-to-house canvass were made in many instances, and some churches provided automobiles for aged and infirm persons who wished to attend the services. The newspapers of the city were especially helpful in giving the plans publicity.

First Building Still in Use—The congregation at Wilmington Park has rededicated the building which was given to it by the Wilmington church. The building, which was erected in 1870, was the first Presbyterian church in southern California and was the scene of the organization of Los Angeles Presbytery. In its new location it begins a new career of usefulness. The suggestion has been made that the building be suitably marked with a tablet so that its connection with the historic events that have taken place within its walls may not be forgotten.

The First Presbyterian Church Built in Southern California, Now Removed for Further Service.

Plan New Building — Second church, Long Beach, under the leadership of its pastor, Rev. A. Grant Evans, has launched a building project.

Would Open Churches Week Days—The Interdenominationl Ministerial Association has inaugurated a movement to provide restrooms for persons who wish to use the church buildings during the week. The plan is to have the buildings open for use during certain hours of the day for rest, meditation and prayer. The public library will cooperate in furnishing reading matter.

Fight Extension of Saloons—Several years ago the city council closed Hill street to the sale of liquor. Women and children have had a shopping district in which they could move without meeting crowds which frequent the neighborhood of saloons. An ordinance opening Hill street from First to Ninth street recently passed the council and the ministerial associations of the city are united in memorializing the council to revoke this menace.

Going Home for Christmas

A Special train from Oregon to New York passed through Chicago Dec. 10, carrying 300 foreign-born Americans to their homes in Germany, Italy, and Hungary. These people have settled on Western farm lands and are now on their way to their fatherland for the Christmas holidays.

What sort of influence from America do they carry back?

On the stories they tell, on the reports they give of this country will depend the ideas of America in the minds of hundreds of their fellow countrymen, many of whom will likely return with these travelers in the spring. If they carry to the interior of their native land an impulse to right living and clean thinking which they may have acquired from mission workers in the United States they will be centers of mission influence.

Dubuque German College and Seminary is a "home mission factory" training men of foreign speech to work as spiritual leaders among such groups as are represented in this Christmas excursion. Our graduates touch their fellow countrymen in many centers.

May we give you more information about our work? Address Dubuque German College and Seminary, C. M. Steffens, D.D., president, Dubuque, Iowa.

EXTEND WORK OF THE CITY CHURCHES

New Preaching Places Established—Seminary Professors Dine Together—To Leave City Parish for "Wickedest Place in Alaska."

CHICAGO—Presbyterianism of this city is continually assuming enlarged duties with the shifting of population. In addition to the survey of religious conditions in the Bryn Mawr region, the Church Extension Board has been investigating the number of churches in the Ravenswood region and finds that at the end of the Ravenswood branch of the elevated railroad, over a mile west of Ravenswood church, there are fifty Presbyterian families with no near-by church organization of any denomination. Plans are under way for preaching services of some sort there if a meeting place can be found. New work for the Bohemians has been started under the direction of Mr. Vanek in Morton Park and arrangements have been made for monthly preaching services for Bohemians at Coal City. The Italians at Coal City, aroused at the address of Mr. De Luca several weeks ago, have asked for another address and Mr. De Luca will visit them again next month.

Seminary Professors Fraternize — The twenty-seventh annual dinner of the faculties of the theological seminaries of the city was held at the Great Northern hotel last Friday night. Representatives of theological seminaries of the Methodist, Presbyterian, Baptist, Congregational, Lutheran, Universalist and Episcopal churches were present, the latter for the first time. Dr. A. H. Hayes of Garrett Biblical Institute discussed the changes in different denominations and there were other comments on closer affiliation of the various institutions. Dr. Zenos and Professor Hobson of McCormick Seminary took part in the evening's program.

Raise Sunday School Fund—Through the active work of hundreds of workers in Sunday schools the fund of $100,000 was raised for Cook county Sunday school work and the expenses of the convention of the International Sunday School Association in this city next June. William A. Peterson of Edgewater church was chairman of the finance committee.

Will Go to Alaska—Rev. J. L. McBride of Rogers Park church surprised presbytery recently by announcing that he intended to go to what the Home Board calls the wickedest place in Alaska next spring. His wife, a graduate of the Presbyterian Training School, has long cherished a desire to go to the north as a missionary.

Members Read Papers—Wilmette church has aroused large interest in the Wednesday evening meetings through discussion of papers presented by the pastor, Dr. J. M. Wilson, and members of the congregation. The series will close with a watch-night service Dec. 31. Among the subjects discussed have been "The Bible in the Public Schools," "The Church Creed: What Is It, and Is It Worth Preserving?" "Calvinism: A Study of Its Doctrine," and "The Place of the Church in Social Reforms."

Plan Aggressive Evangelism—Presbytery Monday morning decided on recommendation to churches of definite evangelistic work during January and February. Reports each week at ministers' meeting and a house-to-house canvass and personal work by members are other parts of the plan presented by the evangelistic committee, of which Dr. J. J. Rae is chairman.

Urge Service New Year's Eve—The church federation is calling on churches of all denominations to hold watch-night union services in their neighborhoods to keep young people from the downtown district.

Lunch with Dr. Boyle—Sixty ministers and laymen of presbytery met at the University Club Monday to join in an informal farewell to Dr. W. H. W. Boyle. Dr. E. H. Curtis presided and there were many warm tributes to the departing presbyter. Dr. Boyle will begin his pastorate at Woodward Avenue church, Detroit, with the new year, and will remove there as soon as Mrs. Boyle, who lately underwent a serious operation, can leave the hospital at Lake Forest.

Chinese Are Progressing—Progress is being made toward the definite establishment of the interdenominational Chinese church, plans for which were made last spring. The purchase of a building is under consideration and the Chinese themselves insist that they have a regularly appointed pastor of their own nationality.

Catholics Fill the Field — Investigation of the Church Extension Board has shown that there is a large territory in the Bryn Mawr section in which the Catholics have the only religious work. A "Bible hour" on Sunday afternoon for children has been started by a young woman under Catholic auspices, although the denominational affiliation has been concealed. Five young women of the Presbyterian Training School are now at work surveying the district preparatory to the establishment of some sort of Protestant work.

Brief Items—The Church Federation has arranged for a deaconess to attend the juvenile court to care for Protestant children brought there.—Woodlawn church is finding vesper services during the winter months more attractive than evening services.—Christian Endeavorers of the city will provide 1,500 boxes of good cheer for hospital patients of the city.—The Volunteers of America are planning a large number of dinners for poor people at Christmas time. Several free public dinners will be given.—Following a paper by Dr. J. M. Wilson presbytery on Monday ordered the appointment of a committee to investigate local conditions concerning the growth of the spirit of absolutism in church and civic life.—South side branch of the Christian Industrial League will be opened with the ministers of presbytery present Dec. 29.

PUBLIC SCHOOLS WILL STUDY BIBLE

North Dakota Plan Is to Be Tried in Indiana—Church Federation Planning to Use Newspapers to Reach People.

INDIANAPOLIS—Announcement has just been made that "the rich literature and history of the Bible is to become a source of knowledge for the school children of Indiana" by the adoption of the North Dakota plan for Bible study in the public schools. The superintendent of public instruction, C. A. Greathouse, has made public this plan, whereby the Bible literature and history will be given its due place in public school courses alongside other "classics" of the world.

Personal Items—Rev. Melvin E. Trotter and his singer, Peter Quartel, leaders in rescue mission work, were in the city for a brief campaign. They assisted E. A. Larson in meetings at the local mission and spoke in three of the larger churches.—R. C. Hughes, D. D., of the Board of Education addressed the young people of First church on a recent Sunday evening.—Rev. L. W. Sherwin declared vacant the Greenfield pulpit on Nov. 30.—First church has granted the pastor, Dr. M. L. Haines, a six months' leave of absence. He sails Feb. 17 on the Adriatic for Egypt and the Holy Land and will be accompanied by his wife and daughter.

Talks to Boys; to Women—The boy scout movement was explained to a large meeting of boys by means of motion pictures during the visit of a representative of the national council. A play, enlisting fifty scouts, was a supplementary feature.—"Benefits of Public Health Nursing" were explained to an audience of ladies at First church by Miss Alice Fitzgerald, who is to superintend the nurses' training school in the new Robert Long hospital, just opening.

Churches to Join in Advertising—The state session of the Federal Council of Churches was addressed by President Shailer Mathews of the national council in Second church. The local federation has opened a Bible depository at the office of Secretary M. C. Pearson in the Y. M. C. A. building. Plans for a year's advertising campaign of church matter were considered at a luncheon of ministers interested in the federation last week. Special items to be included were a church attendance day, a church letter day, a house-to-house visitation of the city and an evangelistic campaign in each church.

Meetings for Men—The tenth year of the "big meetings" under auspices of the Y. M. C. A. was opened by Secretary Goddard Sunday, Nov. 16. The address was by Clinton Howard, D. D., of Rochester, N. Y. J. C. Nayghe, a native of Greece, was the speaker last week. He gave an Oriental interpretation of the twenty-third psalm, based upon his personal experiences in the Lebanon mountains.

WANT BROTHERHOOD MEN TO BE DOERS

Annual Gathering of Cincinnati Union Enthusiastic—Girls Give Concert to Build Classroom for Boys at Norwood Church.

CINCINNATI — "The brotherhood expects every man to be a doer" is the slogan which has been adopted by the new administration of the union of the Presbyterian Brotherhood in Cincinnati and surrounding territory. That gathering of men at Avondale church was an inspiration. Two hundred in round numbers sat down to a turkey feast enlivened by song and speech. How those men did sing! It was a revelation to everybody. William A. Evans is president-elect of the union and weekly conferences of the executive committee are to be held—Monday gatherings at dinner. Dr. W. F. Weir, chairman of Ohio synodical brotherhood committee, addressed the gathering. Robert P. Hargitt presided and additions to the official board were: Vice presidents, Harry B. Mackoy, Bible study; W. E. Kreidler, religious work; J. C. Gregson, fellowship; Ren Mulford, Jr., publicity; W. A. Stark, secretary, and M. L. Kirkpatrick, treasurer.

An Evanston Anniversary—Rev. Lewis Earle Lee and Mrs. Lee have won a big place in the hearts of the Evanston people. On the first anniversary of his pastorate an appreciation, penned in verse by Mrs. L. S. Munson, was read by Miss Laura Lang. Mrs. Lee also wrote some poetic "anniversary thoughts."

A chance to enlist in a kindly service

TO OUR SUBSCRIBERS:

The Continent has many requests every week to place deserving institutions on its free list.

There are thousands of worthy objects. Thus:

Home missionaries
Foreign missionaries
Retired ministers
Orphans' homes
Industrial homes
"Shut ins"
Church libraries
Y. M. C. A. libraries
College libraries
Old people's homes
Soldiers' homes
Institutional churches
Sunday school libraries

And so on. Then there are opportunities to present Christian truths to the public. Christian Scientists are about the only persons who avail themselves of the opportunity to place literature in railway stations. There are thousands of hotels where men cannot secure good literature.

The number of copies The Continent may legally send free is limited; and extra postage is required. And while it may seem a small thing to send one copy one time, every paper represents an actual expenditure of money that, multiplied by fifty-two and by hundreds of beneficiaries, represents an amount no one would expect to be paid out solely by us.

Here is the chance to do a kindly service at a small cost which any one can meet. Think it over. If you do not know of a person or institution that would benefit we can find one readily enough. Send us a card indicating your desire and you will receive information as to rate, and the recipient of your kindness will be informed of it.

greater comfort and privilege for boys. This is the record of Norwood's Sunshine Girls. There is a lack of classroom for an organization of boys of the "teen" age. This Norwood organization of girls—one of the largest classes in Ohio—took steps to create a fund for this purpose. Their colonial concert at Sharpsburg school was a superlative success.

Personal Notes—Rev. Jesse M. Tidball of Minonk, Ill., occupied Dr. McMillin's pulpit on Walnut Hills Sunday.—Rev. Peter Robertson of Mohawk church presided at the eighty-sixth annual dinner of the Caledonian Society at the Scottish Rite cathedral.—Colonel William B. Melish talked on "Yellowstone Park" at the Price Hill church, the Westminster.—At Seventh church a big congregation enjoyed a Sabbath afternoon presentation of the cantata "Ruth."—At Lane Seminary Dr. C. F. Goss is giving a practical series of talks on "The Sermon."—Rev. B. L. Schuyler recently gave the congregation at Fourth church a splendid talk on "The Life, Customs and Religion of Syria."

ENLARGE CHURCH BY STARTING ANEW

Reorganization Near Seattle Attracts New Members—Relocated Sunday School Prospers—Much Activity on North Pacific Coast.

SEATTLE—There was a fine piece of ecclesiastical statesmanship in the dissolution and reorganization of the suburban church at Kent. For several years this church has been passing through deep waters, but during the two years' pastorate of Rev. W. A. Couden those in the church were solidified and organized for aggressive work, but outsiders looked upon the enterprise askance and the work of building up was difficult. Finally under Mr. Couden's leadership before he left to take up Sunday school work in Spokane Presbytery the church and adherents and executive commission and the presbytery itself all agreed upon a thorough reorganization. A large commission, with W. O. Forbes, D. D., as chairman and with Rev. C. R. McMillin in charge of the work on the field, was appointed by presbytery, resulting in the dissolution of the church and on Nov. 25 the organization of the Olivet church of Kent with eighty-six charter members—ten on confession, twenty on reaffirmation of faith, forty-six by letter from the old church and the rest by letter from other churches. This all in place of the original church with less than fifty active members.

Sunday School Rejuvenated—A like move in Sunday school work was consummated in Van Assult, a mission of First church in the city. The old mission property was appropriated by the railroad and yards extended in such a way as to make it impossible to use it any more. The school was abandoned. The chairman of the missions committee of First church, with the synodical superintendent of Sabbath schools, selected a suitable site on the hill and a portable chapel was moved in from another part of the city, repainted and otherwise refitted, and on Sunday, Nov. 23, was rededicated, Dr. Matthews preaching the sermon, and on the next week a fine new Sunday school was organized with Dr. F. L. Forbes, assistant pastor of First church, in charge.

Finish New Church—There has been a forward movement at Rainier Beach church. Last July Rev. W. A. Henricks was called from Laramie, Wyo., to the church, which had been vacant six months. He found a devoted but somewhat discouraged band in an unfinished building of some pretensions with no furniture at all in the auditorium. The people rallied around him and on Sunday, Dec. 7, the auditorium, completely furnished and with a $400 organ installed, was dedicated with appropriate services.

Pastoral Changes—Dr. A. N. Thompson of Madrona, Dr. W. A. Major of Bethany, Rev. Frank Edgar Mason of Port Angeles and Rev. Herbert A. French of Algona all have resigned their respective pastorates and are leaving their churches this month.

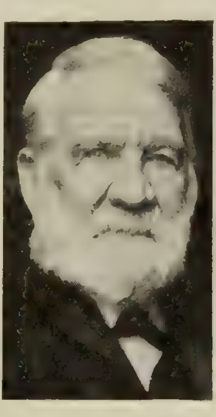
LARGE CHURCH HAS ANNIVERSARY

PENNSYLVANIA—York First church celebrated its sesquicentennial the second week of December. Much gratification was felt in the presence of the pastor, Dr. J. E. Tuttle, to conduct it, as he had been absent for some weeks on account of sickness. An address on the history of the church was given by a son of the former pastor, H. C. Niles. Many greetings were received from ministers and former members, some near at hand and some at a distance. The church has a membership of 800 with 1,000 in the Sunday school. It is also noted for its large benevolences.

New Lancaster Church—Memorial church, Lancaster, Rev. H. W. Haring pastor, recently laid the corner stone of a new edifice which will seat with its chapel 1,000 and cost $50,000. Dr. L. S. Mudge, pastor of First church and moderator of synod, recently called to the pastorate of the Pine Street church of Harrisburg, made an address.

Brief Items—Ardmore church, Rev. E. E. Ranson pastor, is deeply alive for the welfare of those outside its ranks and is using active efforts to reach them. A meeting for men only was recently addressed by James I. Donaghy. He gave a "policeman's" view of present day social problems.—Physicians recommend a six months' rest for Dr. W. R. Laird, pastor for twenty years of First church, West Chester. He will probably go to Bermuda. The congregation is considering the employment of a substitute.

PIONEER PHYSICIAN-ELDER DEAD



Dr. W. H. Wishard

Because of his advanced years and diversified interest in local affairs, the passing of Elder William H. Wishard, M. D., in Indianapolis on Dec. 9 was especially recognized by his city. The press, the State Medical Society, of which he was a charter member, and Seventh church, of which he was senior elder, all gave special emphasis to his relations with their particular circle of influence. Born in Kentucky over ninety-seven years ago, he came to Indiana at the age of 9 years with his parents, who settled in Johnson county not far from Indianapolis. After residence at Greenwood and Southport, suburbs, he removed to Indianapolis, which has always remained his home.

In his career as physician he served as volunteer surgeon during the civil war, in which he made a place in history for his name, because of his reports and advice concerning the removal of sick soldiers from the southern hospitals to the more congenial quarters and homes in the North. He served one term as coroner of Marion county and was president of the State Medical Society on the fiftieth anniversary of his membership. He was ordained an elder in the Presbyterian Church in 1845 and remained an active member of his session until the close of his life—a term of over sixty-eight years.

He was not only zealous in the local church, but served frequently in the committee work of presbytery. Six times he was sent as commissioner to General Assembly. First, he went in 1846 to the "new school" Assembly. In 1869 he met with the Assembly in New York, which adopted the plan of union with the "old school" body, then in session in the same city. He often related with much feeling his impression of the historic "adjourned meeting" of this Assembly in Pittsburg when the union of the two branches of the church was consummated.

He is survived by a brother, Samuel Wishard, D. D., of Los Angeles, Cal., who, in his eighty-eighth year, is still active in preaching and correspondence work; also by three sons, William W., Albert W. and George G., and two daughters, Mrs. John G. Wishard of Wooster, Ohio, and Miss Elizabeth. The latter was for several years young people's secretary of the Board of Foreign Missions.

MINISTERIAL OBITUARY

William James McConkey, D. D., 76 years old, pastor emeritus of First church, Grove City, Pa., died recently at his home from heart failure. He was born in 1837 and was the oldest member of Butler Presbytery in point of continuous service. He was a graduate of Jefferson College before it became part of Washington and Jefferson College, and also of Western Theological Seminary. After pastorates in Ohio Dr. McConkey went to Grove City in 1875, where he was for twelve years pastor of Center and Grove City congregations. From 1887 to 1911 he devoted his entire time to Grove City church.

Rev. Jesse Clyde Engel, at the age of 40, died Nov. 25 at Colorado Springs, having gone there a few weeks previous from his work at Edgeley, N. D., hoping to regain his failing health. Mr. Engel was a graduate of McCormick Seminary. His work was wholly in North Dakota. He was stated clerk and chairman of the home mission committee of Oakes Presbytery. He was not only a preacher of power but he was a musician of no mean ability. It was his custom to organize the boys of the Sunday school into a band. He leaves a widow and two little girls. In accordance with his request Rev. J. G. West, assisted by Messrs. Burchfield and Hepner, conducted his funeral at Center View, Mo., his birthplace.

Canadians Plan American Trip

Preparations are being made by 200 brotherhood men of Canada to make a tour of the United States in May. They plan to visit New York, Buffalo, Washington, Philadelphia and Chicago and their advent will probably be accompanied by large meetings of men in these cities.

"Peace Sunday" Comes Dec. 21

The American Peace Society at Washington has called the attention of the churches to the desirability of giving special attention to the subject of world peace next Sabbath. The third Sunday in December was selected for this purpose by the international peace congress held in London in 1890.

Dr. S. S. Cryor has been compelled to leave Oakes, N. D., which church he recently accepted, on account of his health.

TAKE LARGE THANK OFFERING

ILLINOIS—A thank offering for missions of $310, the largest in the history of the church, was taken at the Thanksgiving service of Willow Creek church, Argyle. This country church has for nine years supported its own foreign missionary. Rev. M. L. Pearson is pastor.

Dr. W. S. Marquis

Men Are Active—A laymen's missionary convention is to be held in Carbondale Jan. 27-28.—The brotherhoods of Cairo and Ewing Presbyteries have been invited to hold their joint convention in February at Anna.

Severs Thirty Years' Relationship—Nov. 30 was the farewell Sabbath at Broadway church, Rock Island, of Dr. William S. Marquis, who has served the church for thirty years. At the morning hour of worship impressive communion service was held. In the evening there was a union farewell service, when the pastors of churches of the city connected with the ministerial alliance came to say their "fare-ye-wells." A farewell reception was given to the pastor and his family Thanksgiving evening, when the Sabbath school room was crowded to its doors. The church feels it has made a great sacrifice in giving up the pastor and his family. He has been made pastor emeritus. Dr. Marquis goes to Chicago to assume the duties of superintendent of benevolences for Illinois.

Entertain the Boys—The men of Galesburg church were recently hosts at a dinner to which the boys of the congregation were invited. Addresses were made by both fathers and sons.

Church Remodeled—The remodeled building at Appanoose several miles southeast of Niota was dedicated Dec. 7. The improvements cost $5,000.

BRING NEWS OF WORLD MISSIONS

OKLAHOMA—The visit of gospel team workers from various portions of the state has been a feature of the world missionary campaign which has its headquarters in Oklahoma City. The campaign opened Dec. 7 with outside speakers in most of the pulpits of the city. Among those participating are Dr. J. C. Garritt, Nanking, China; Doctors C. E. Bradt, Francis M. Fox and G. N. Luccock, Chicago; Dr. Wilbur F. Crafts, Washington, D. C.; Rev. George H. Trull, New York; J. M. Patterson and Bishop Robert McIntyre. In addition to popular meetings each day various study classes are being held and visitors from all parts of the state are attending the meetings.

New Church Soon—The congregation at Kiowa is preparing to build a new church. Following a series of meetings in November a number of additions were made to the church. Rev. J. D. Braly is pastor.

Brief Items—Rev. C. A. Boycan recently assisted Rev. S. A. McPherson, pastor, in a series of meetings in Mill Creek.—Rev. L. B. Parker at Heavener by cooperation with the local editor is obtaining a large amount of publicity for the church and religion in general.—A series of evangelistic meetings recently closed at Adamson.

ORGANIZE THE YOUNG PEOPLE

CALIFORNIA—Rev. William McClung, who has recently taken charge of Los Molinos church, is meeting with a cheering response from his people. The Christian Endeavor society has been reorganized and a junior society established.

Eight Years at San Jose—Rev. H. H. McQuilkin has just completed eight years as pastor of San Jose First church. During this time 882 persons have been received into the membership. The active membership is now 907.

Hanford Church Dedicated—The new church at Hanford was recently dedicated with appropriate ceremonies. Dr. C. W. Sherman of Berkeley delivered the dedicatory sermon and Rev. G. B. Greig, a former pastor, preached in the evening.

INDIANS PUSH EVANGELISM

IDAHO—The Nez Perce Indian churches, six in number, are taking up their usual evangelistic work for the winter. Often the elders and others go with the ministers and assist in these services. They have been held in Kamiah Second and Meadow Creek churches with good results. Services will be held in each of the other churches before the winter closes. Rev. James Hayes, the Indian evangelist, recently visited Arizona Indians. Rev. William Wheeler, one of the older Nez Perce ministers, is supplying the Umatilla Indian church. Miss Kate C. McBath, the pioneer Indian missionary and teacher, continues to instruct her students. Miss Mazie Crawford, her assistant, conducts a service each Sabbath evening and sustains a Sabbath school in the tuberculosis hospital operated by the government in the old Lapwai Indian school building. Children from all the tribes in the Pacific northwest who have symptoms of tuberculosis are brought to this hospital for treatment.—Rev. William Lattimore, pastor of Lewiston church, has sufficiently recovered from his recent severe illness to be able to occupy his pulpit.

Many Adults in Sunday School—Parma church with a membership of 115 has two adult Bible classes with an aggregate enrollment of nearly 100. Four classes in the congregation are studying immigration. The pastor is Rev. Bruce J. Giffen.

Call Roll of Babies—Jerome church, Rev. C. M. Junkin, pastor, on a recent Sunday started a cradle roll of seventeen members. The mothers were present with their babies and as the names were called each came forward to receive a certificate of membership.

COUNTRY CHURCHES REJOICE

MINNESOTA—The fifteenth anniversary of the organization of Cove church, the pioneer congregation of the Mille Lac region will be observed Friday, Dec. 19, with addresses by Dr. John T. Bergen, Rev. J. S. Handyside, R. F. Sulzer and others. During the first part of the week special services were held at Onomia and on Saturday and Sunday special meetings were held at Wahkon. These organizations are all the outgrowth of the activities of Sunday school missionaries. Cove church was organized by Rev. T. M. Findley, pastor-evangelist, and Thomas Scotton, Sunday school missionary.

New Church Free of Debt—The new church at Rushmore was dedicated Dec. 7. This building is one of the most beautiful and complete in southern Minnesota, with an auditorium, two classrooms and a basement, costing with heating and lighting systems $6,000, all of which was raised before the dedication. R. N. Adams, D. D., who organized the church and preached the sermon at the dedication of the first church twenty-five years ago, preached the sermon on this occasion. He was assisted in the service by Rev. J. D. Gibb, a former pastor, and Rev. L. F. Badger, pastor-at-large. The pastor is Rev. Joseph Wray.

HOME MISSION CHURCH HAS GROWN

MONTANA—The Sunday school and social rooms recently built as an addition to First church, Great Falls, will be dedicated Dec. 21 by Dr. C. E. Schaible of Bushnell, Ill. The church is located at the edge of the business district and the addition cost $25,000, making the property worth $75,000. The church was organized as a home mission field in 1886 with thirteen members and now has 453. The pastor is Rev. E. P. Giboney.

Will Be Dedicated Dec. 21

"I HAVE ALWAYS HESITATED—"

A pastor in Ohio who is doing things writes the news editor that he has made a good resolution before the first of the year and will not keep to himself all the stimulating ideas which help his congregation. "You can't get news unless someone furnishes the material," he truly says. The Continent wants to be a stimulating and helpful force to all its readers. Not all of the ideas which work in one church can be applied to other congregations with the same success, but the knowledge of them strengthens purposes and stimulates courage.

It costs $2,500 a month to keep the Chicago Church Extension Board and its missions in operation.

"A note of thankfulness"

TO THE CONTINENT: Loyalty to our feeling would often lead us to send in a note of thankfulness to The Continent for its good and helpful articles and editorials. Why we so often put off pleasing ourselves in this way, we cannot very well describe. He we are, however, and we want to thank you.

The article "Pious Insults to God," Continent Nov. 6, is good and timely.

"Is Christian Unity a Dream?" Oct. 30, clear, comprehensive and vigorous. High thought and sound theology expressed in simple words and phrases; characteristic of the author. A vein of genuinely fraternal spirit runs throughout.

Your editorial on "The Consecration of Sorrow" in the same issue has, we doubt not, already helped many a drooping spirit and afflicted heart.

"The Changing and Changeless" opening the issue of Nov. 13 is beautifully sane and restful.

Dr. Jowett's message is always good, wholesome, penetrating, cleansing, comforting.

The writer is even now conscious of the help received from your splendid article of some time ago on Samuel's words to the people of Israel: "Moreover, as for me, God forbid that I should sin against the Lord in ceasing to pray for you." R. C.

Read the "WANT" Column every week. The thing in which you are interested may be advertised in this very issue.

This Is One of Our First Farm Mortgages

No. 3974—Bartholomew, $2000 00, 6%, due October 1, 1919. Interest payable annually.

The security is a quarter section in Renville County, N. D., located 3 miles from first-class market in a prosperous community. Every acre tillable and, with the exception of 20 acres, under plow. The buildings on this land are worth $1,500.00 and covered by insurance. The land without buildings is worth $4,000.00. The borrower is an American 35 years of age, lives on this land and works it himself. Aside from this tract he owns another quarter section. A first-class farmer in every way.

A fair sample of the class of investments we handle. Send for descriptive pamphlet "C" and current list of offerings if interested in safe, sound interest bearing securities. 30 years experience. Highest references.

What Are the Lessons of Failure of New Haven to Pay Dividend?—Government Ownership of Telegraph Promises to Be Discussed.

Many lessons might be drawn from the failure of the New York, New Haven and Hartford railroad to declare a dividend this month. For forty years the road had been paying from 5 to 10 per cent a year. It had been expected that the dividend rate would be decreased at this time in order to permit the new president, Howard Elliott, to reestablish the road on a safe basis, but the passing of the dividend was more or less of a surprise. According to men who have studied this road, the sole reason for the failure to pay a return on stock now is past manipulation. It is claimed that dividends in other years have been paid when the earnings would not justify so great return to the owners of stock. If this is true it corresponds to the action of an individual who spends more than his income justifies. When this is done by a corporation or an individual disaster must follow. In the case of the railway it is expected that affairs will be in shape soon to resume dividends. The price of the stock just after the passing of the dividend dropped 210 points under its highest market value. This means that people who bought at the highest price and sold at the lowest lost $210 a share. Owners of stock who had counted on receiving their usual check before Christmas will be disappointed. The loss will be felt by other corporations, the Pennsylvania road, for example, owning over $5,000,000 worth of stock at par value. The loss of interest is absolute. People with small capital who depended on the New Haven stock for considerable part of their income for the winter will have to look elsewhere.

What About Farm Mortgages?—The fact that a strong railway system has failed to have enough money in its strong box to make needed repairs and also to pay stockholders is no reflection on railroad or other stocks. The holder of stock becomes in a sense a partner in the concern and must take the profits brought by the management of the business. If the Pennsylvania road, mentioned above, had had its $5,000,000 invested in farm mortgages, as have most of the life insurance companies, the interest would have been paid, or the land mortgaged could have been sold. But, on the other hand, money in farm mortgages would not have been available quickly in a sudden emergency, if, for example, the Pennsylvania had wanted to raise cash for some purpose. Railroad stock can be sold any day, although recently it would have been sold at a big loss. The owners of bonds in the New Haven are, of course, not affected by the failure of the directors to declare a dividend on the stock.

Shall We Own the Telegraph?—It has recently been reported that President Wilson is giving considerable attention to the subject of government-owned telegraph and telephone lines. The United States is the only large country where such means of communication are privately owned. At present if we want to communicate with a person 100 miles away and are not in a hurry we ask the government to carry the message. If we are in a hurry we ask a private corporation to do it, and of course pay a profit to someone for the service we buy. Some government officials for several years have suggested the reasonableness of having what is virtually an economic monopoly in the hands of the public.

Stories of Financial Success—Replies to the request of The Continent for letters concerning successful investments have been numerous. The best letters will appear in the issue of Jan. 1. They are chapters of real life telling how women and ministers have saved and invested their surplus. Suggestions of ways to stimulate saving by children will also be found in this special issue.

Brief Bits of Business News—Hog cholera in Kansas and North Dakota, and in Michigan a disease similar to this dread scourge, is alarming the live stock interests of the country as well as the farmers themselves.—This country in the last nine months exported 65,000,000 feet of unexposed moving picture film and 23,000,000 feet of film ready to be shown in the theaters of the world.—Railroads numbering 170 show for October about $1,000,000 increase in gross revenue and $12,000,000 decrease in net income.

Bethlehem lay in a manger so many hundreds of years ago.

So Tabitha fills the goatskin churn nearly full of milk and she and her mother take turns rocking the bag of milk back and forth on their knees until the butter begins to come. Her mother does not leave the butter in a solid mass as the buttermakers of this country do, but instead she melts it up into oil, which she stores away in earthen jars. She uses this in frying or, instead of the olive oil, in cooking rice.

When her mother washes, Tabitha helps her carry the clothes to a near-by stream. Then they sprinkle wood ashes upon the garments and beat them as hard as they can with flat, paddlelike sticks until the dirt disappears.

One morning after several busy days, Tabitha's mother announces that they will go to town. Tabitha hastens to put on a clean frock. Her mother wears a flowing robe of delicate yellow over the white inner dress fastened at the waist by a soft girdle. She covers her face and her pretty headdress with a veil. The headdress is a tight fitting red cap covered with silver coins. Tabitha admires her mother's headdress very much, but she hopes to be able to afford one of gold coins for herself when she grows up. Her mother never takes off this cap with the heavy ornaments, but if her husband should fall into debt she would gladly give it up to pay what he owed.

Tabitha's mother tosses the baby over her shoulder and, taking Tabitha by the hand, sets out across the valley toward the steps which lead up to the town. Up the steep hill dotted with white, flat-roofed houses they climb until Tabitha claps her hands and cries, "The camels! The camels!" They have reached the marketplace where a caravan has just arrived from the desert. Tabitha has often seen camels, but never so many at one time. She and her mother stop a few moments to watch the big tawny creatures kneel to be unloaded and to listen to the noisy bargaining of the traders. Tabitha grasps her mother's hand more tightly and clings more closely to her side as they pass the red-fezzed Turkish soldiers who keep guard outside the sacred grotto.

They enter the quiet cave hewn out of the solid rock and as the little maid of Bethlehem gazes reverently at the silver star her mother tells her once more of the story of the Babe in the manger. She and that other Child of Bethlehem are a little alike, thinks Tabitha—patient, helpful and obedient to father and mother.

Christmas Day in the Isles of Delight

let you carry it off." The little joke faltered in the stony glare of the young woman.

"Indeed"—she waved her bedraggled ostrich feathers—"you cannot have this umbrella."

"But I must," cried Elizabeth stoutly; "you see, it isn't mine."

Mrs. Wright interfered; she leaned forward and Elizabeth's world grew brighter in the light of her smile:

"Didn't it occur to you that it was rather a handsome umbrella for a little Japanese boy to have?"

"No; I never looked at it, I was so busy. Is it yours?" she turned on the young man and he shook his head smilingly.

"This"—the young woman waved a costly silver handle before Elizabeth's eyes—"this is my umbrella. I left it against a chair a moment and when I next saw it you were holding it over your head. Mrs. Wright and I were out in the rain."

Elizabeth's cheeks were red; she was trembling all over; her honest eyes, widening, looked straight into those of the young woman:

"Why—why—but of course you knew that I——" Then she straightened. "Did it occur to you for a moment that I would take your umbrella knowingly?"

"Well, of course, it looked rather strange to——"

"And let Mrs. Wright and you get soaked with the rain and use your umbrella, when it was pouring, if I hadn't thought it was not needed!" Elizabeth was getting mixed; she stopped, her voice shaking.

"My dear," said Mrs. Wright, "we didn't think it out really. If we had we might have known there was some mistake; we were so angry at getting wet and finding our umbrella gone that we vented our vexation on anybody. Do forgive us; of course we know that you are not responsible."

"There is a little Japanese boy who is evidently not the soul of honor," said the young man.

"Of course, I have been awfully stupid, but when Ishi brought it I never thought——"

Here Mr. Wright spoke to Elizabeth: "Won't you kindly get in the car and let us drive you——"

"Home to dinner with us," added his wife, "unless you have another engagement."

Another engagement, indeed! "Oh, thank you, I should be most happy." The reaction was almost too great. Elizabeth stumbled into the automobile.

She nodded good-by to the young man standing under the umbrella, and Mr. Wright called over his shoulder, "Come and see us, Howland."

They had gone but a short distance when Mrs. Wright said: "This is the turn by which we take Miss Wilson home." So the young friend was not coming to dinner!

AS THEY made the turn Elizabeth cried out, "Oh, there is Ishi! Would you mind stopping and letting me speak to him?" The rain had ceased when Elizabeth pounced upon the two little Japanese loaded to their eyes with gifts; it was quite evident that they had often dropped their ill-gotten gains, for marks of mud were all over them and their presents.

Now they were so startled that "he" dropped a doll and Ishi an orange. In recovering these they dropped more toys. Elizabeth picked them up and stuffed them into the short arms.

"Ishi, where did you get that umbrella you brought me?"

"Lady leave—you nice lady—very kind—you not wet—he wet—me wet."

"Of course it was very kind of you to give it to me and get wet yourself, it certainly was." Elizabeth stopped to pick up a doll stiff with mud, and patted "he's" round yellow cheek. "But you shouldn't have taken it without asking the lady."

"Lady no give—you get wet—lady not know."

"Ishi, you said you had no ticket"—she rescued an orange from the gutter; "that was not true."

Ishi smiled placidly. "He want plenty doll, me want plenty toy."

"Ishi, you come to my school, the Williams kindergarten; I will teach you about truth."

Ishi nodded tranquilly and they trudged serenely on. As Elizabeth turned toward the Wrights she saw the sun was shining.

Offers Men Chances to Invest Time

The National Brotherhood office has recently prepared a list of ten assorted opportunities for men to invest their time in local church work. A copy of the circular was distributed to men at the regular Tuesday noon luncheon of Chicago Presbyterians and the leaflet will be furnished in quantities to local brotherhoods for distribution to men of their churches. It is modeled after the circular of a banking house and purports to be issued by "The Brotherhood Investment Company." It suggests opportunities for men to work half an hour every six months, two hours a week or ten minutes a week in various forms of service for the

Strong Evangelist Has Spare Time

Would Like to Hold Union Evangelist Meetings in January-February

Robert E. Johnson, an evangelist now holding meetings in Sault Ste. Marie, Mich., where he is having marvelous decisions for Christ, finds he has time for a January-February meeting. He would like to get into communication at once with anyone who wishes to have such meetings at that time. He has been in the work for 14 years and bears the strongest recommendations from all places he has been and from all the leading workers who have heard him.

If you want an evangelist to hold union meetings communicate with him at Sault Ste. College Attendance Breaks Record

Figures furnished the College Board indicate that Presbyterian colleges have entered upon a record-breaking year in point of attendance. Thirty of these colleges—the only ones which have sent complete reports—show an enrollment in the regular college classes at the opening of this year of 213 more students than the same colleges had during the whole of last year.

Always a large number of students do not start to college during the first few weeks and many are always added at the beginning of the second semester in January. The number in attendance in October of this year is far in advance of the total attendance during the whole of last year.

It is quite usual for a college year to start with fewer students than it enrolled at the end of the preceding year, and such a start does not indicate real loss, yet nineteen of the institutions which have reported show at the present time 364 more students in the regular college courses than were enrolled during the whole of last year. The nineteen which have made this fine start follow; the figures relate to students in the four college classes only and not including irregular and special students:

	Freshmen		Total Students
	1912	1913	1912	1913
Blackburn	8	21	22	36
Biddle	30	46	92	119
Carroll	73	94	205	238
Davis and Elkins	3	13	25	26
Decatur	134	154	314	317
Hanover	62	61	144	155
Hastings	29	39	62	83
Illinois	44	52	95	125
Idaho	8	30	29	55
Jamestown	6	28	41	62
Lincoln University	39	48	143	143
Macalester	106	132	231	250
Maryville	74	82	190	225
Occidental	90	114	235	293
Park	71	90	225	245
Parsons	39	44	97	109
Tusculum	20	18	42	51
Westminster (Mo.)	36	52	91	104
Western	113	134	226	237
Total	985	1252	2509	2873

The eleven other colleges which sent complete reports show an October enrollment in the regular college classes alone of 1,630. This is only 151 less than these same colleges showed for their regular college classes for the whole of last year. Unofficial reports indicate that a number of other colleges have also made gains and the indications are for the best year in the history of Presbyterian colleges.

To Help Indians of California

The Indian population of California numbers probably 20,000. About 90 per cent of these have small tracts of land upon which to make their homes. A small proportion of the remaining 10 per cent may be provided for from the forest reserve and the public domain, but the greater part, if they have homes, must be provided for by funds granted by Congress. A recent conference which was held by persons interested in the welfare of the Indians took steps looking to the organization of a permanent body which shall be known as the California Indian Mission Council, and issued an appeal asking Congress to provide funds for the purchase of homes for the Indians.

Of the total Indian population perhaps not more than about 2,000 are within reach of definite religious teaching and influence. There are 2,000 Indian children who have no sort of educational advantages whatever. The policy of the state department of public instruction is to treat Indian children the same as the white. It is deemed best for both races that they be educated together. No complaints have ever been made where this policy is carried into effect.

The proposed council is to be composed of representatives of all bodies, ecclesiastical and secular, engaged in work among the Indians of the state of California. It is the purpose of those who lead in the movement that the council shall meet annually and that its work shall be in coordination with the commissioner of Indian affairs and the superintendent of public instruction of California.

A chance to enlist in a kindly service

TO OUR SUBSCRIBERS:

The Continent has many requests every week to place deserving institutions on its free list.

There are thousands of worthy objects. Thus:

Home missionaries
Foreign missionaries
Retired ministers
Orphans' homes
Industrial homes
"Shut ins"
Church libraries
Y. M. C. A. libraries
College libraries
Old people's homes
Soldiers' homes
Institutional churches
Sunday school libraries

And so on. Then there are opportunities to present Christian truths to the public. Christian Scientists are about the only persons who avail themselves of the opportunity to place literature in railway stations. There are thousands of hotels where men cannot secure good literature.

The number of copies The Continent may legally send free is limited; and extra postage is required. And while it may seem a small thing to send one copy one time, every paper represents an actual expenditure of money that, multiplied by fifty-two and by hundreds of beneficiaries, represents an amount no one would expect to be paid out solely by us.

Here is the chance to do a kindly service at a small cost which any one can meet. Think it over. If you do not know of a person or institution that would benefit we can find one readily enough. Send us a card indicating your desire and you will receive information as to rate, and the recipient of your kindness will be informed of it.

Address THE CONTINENT, New York or Chicago

Subscription Terms—The subscription price of The Continent is $2.50 per year payable in advance.

Postage is prepaid on all subscriptions in the United States, Hawaiian Islands, Philippine Islands, Guam, Porto Rico, Canal Zone, Cuba and Mexico.

Foreign Postage—For Canada, 50 cents should be added for postage, and for all other countries in the Postal Union $1.10 should be added for postage.

Remittances should be sent by draft on Chicago or New York, Express or P. O. money orders payable to The Continent. If personal check is sent, 10 cents must be added for collection.

Around the Shop

They tell a story out West about a tenderfoot prospector who perished of thirst with his digging implements at hand, when he could have reached water by going a few feet below the surface almost where he lay. As the Around-the-Shop Man has said before, and Noah may have remarked in his day, many of us miss a lot of the good and helpful things of life because we don't know how to look for them or don't realize they can be had.

An ambitious young fellow from the East struck out in true '49-er spirit for Alaska with the purpose of making his fortune and coming back to demonstrate that the robustious latter-day heroes of fiction can sometimes be found in real life.

As he lounged in the Pullman on his way to Seattle he had plenty of time to decide on the proper amount that would justify his return. One million would do, but three would be better. After a week at Skagway he decided to compromise on half a million, and when winter landed for a continuous engagement he decided that enough money to carry him back to the Atlantic coast would be joyfully adequate. He found himself fortunate to get back to Seattle without selling his boots. By a rare chance he picked up a bargain in a second-class steamer ticket to San Francisco, which took his last nickel. But he knew a man at San Francisco who would befriend him, and he took the chance.

The voyage consumed the better part of three days and, as he had no money, the first day out he slept all day to keep from eating, and then remained up all night to keep from sleeping. The second day he took physical culture exercises to keep his mind from dwelling uncomfortably upon his stomach.

On the third day he could stand the strain no longer and he went down to the dining room and ordered the full offering of the menu. While eating it he conjured up in his mind's eye a picture of a cell in the bastile in San Francisco. After finishing he said to the waiter, "How much do I owe you?"

"Nothing," replied the waiter; "your meals are included in your ticket."

The Continent sets out its table of good things every week—enough to last for the seven days, even without excessive Fletcherization. Already a remarkable number of America's Presbyterians are regular boarders; but a lot more are not included simply because they haven't been made conscious of what they might enjoy.

It's the part of friendship, is it not, to let your acquaintances know that they can have such a feast—including the admonishments of the A.-t.-S. Man—straight through the year for only 5 cents a week?

How Many Bohemians in Texas?

FEW persons not intimately associated with the newer Americans in this country can realize the number of the foreign born. The congested regions of New York and Chicago do not contain them all. Hundreds of farming communities are made up entirely of foreign speaking immigrants. In Texas there are 80,000 Bohemians alone. Of these about 20,000 are Protestants. There are seven organized churches with other preaching stations and Sunday Schools to serve the religious needs of these fellow countrymen of John Huss.

This is one of the fields of opportunity for graduates of Dubuque German College and Seminary, where there are several score of Bohemian students.

The Mexicans in Texas offer another opening for service to the whole country. One of the students of our institution—a Spaniard—last summer opened a preaching point at San Angelo, Texas. There are constant calls for young men of foreign birth to minister to the spiritual needs of their fellows in America.

Our students and graduates have done much interesting work in various portions of the country. We will gladly send details to any one. A postal will do. Address Dubuque German College and Seminary, C. M. Steffens, D.D., President, Dubuque, Iowa.

Lending God a Hand

"O God, thou hast made all things beautiful; but we must lend thee a hand."

This is another of the quotations which Dan Crawford, the missionary, brings back out of the lore of the African jungle to prove his favorite affirmation that God was in Africa speaking to the hearts of men long in advance of any Christian messengers of his—that God now needs missionaries there not to announce him but to confirm with the gospel of Jesus what he has already revealed.

These words, for example, are not the teaching of any white man from civilization. They are the original untutored voice of the jungle itself. The sentence is an ancient formula of prayer which a Bantu laborer, Crawford tells us, invariably uses in the morning before he strikes his hand to his day's work.

The missionary, indeed, with characteristic candor is frank to say that the Bantu does not often show a lively conception of what the words mean. But in their continuing use they remain at least an evidence of the insight of some soul far back in tribal history who had vision of a great truth:

"O God, thou hast made all things beautiful; but we must lend thee a hand."

Howsoever it first came about, there must needs have been a profoundly true practical religion underlying the beginning of this habit of dedicating to God each day's work before it was begun. Surely this is one of the things "hid from the wise and understanding and revealed unto babes"—simple-minded forest savages.

And the present-day American, though so much better taught and higher privileged, can hardly do better than to learn from these black men's lips such a form of words into which he may, if he will, put a meaning sincerely consecrating his own toil to the Father.

"How many Americans," Dan Crawford pungently asks, "begin the day's work with a prayer?"

Certainly the best and noblest day's work is that which the spirit of prayer dominates. And the prayer appropriate to go before our human labor is one whose meaning and intent this bit of Bantu liturgy exquisitely expresses.

If it were only possible that in every corner of the world every morning of the round year every Christian should consciously take up his day's task with the reverent hope of aiding God that day, the face of the world would be glorified forthwith.

The wonder of the universe as God made it is the room found in it for partnership between divine and human forces.

A world made according to logic would have either no place for God to work or else no place for man to work. Logic can demonstrate by half a score of syllogisms that where Omnipotence works at all it must do everything.

But the Father in heaven is not troubled, still less limited, by what men call the "necessities of the case." His omnipotence has chosen to make place within itself for finite endeavor. Almighty God allows for, invites, accepts, rejoices in, a partnership in service and labor from the souls whom he has created.

And that is the supreme and sublimest honor that humanity attains to—the privilege of "lending a hand," as the Bantu savage says, to God; as Paul puts it, of being "God's fellow worker."

Further still, the amazement of divine condescension is that God receives to this honor not a few exceptional souls, but every man, woman and child that would like to help, all the way down to the humblest and the least—"whosoever is of a willing heart."

Not for a moment dares the reverent mind imagine anything grotesque in the simple confidence with which the dark son of Africa offers his digging or his chopping as a contribution to the purposes of his Creator.

The fault is not that he in his simplicity should rate his work too high, but that we who think we see farther rate ours too low.

Nowhere in his plans for humanity has God done a finished work. He has only made a good beginning everywhere. He has "made beautiful" a thousand openings and allurements through which the race of men is challenged by hopes and possibilities of good. But he has not in any place made human welfare complete.

In every aspect of life—physical, social, mental and spiritual—there remains the necessity for men to "lend a hand" before God's ideals are realized. God's consummation everywhere waits on human labor.

There are some who lament this—who are inclined to complain because this world is not a perfect world to begin with. Before they will believe in God's goodness they demand human conditions of absolute order and harmony—some ready-made insurance against pain and blundering.

But those are the wiser observers of God's purposes who thankfully acknowledge his wisdom and kindness in leaving to his creatures the opportunity of "lending him a hand."

Those who see the world most truly are grateful for the meaning imparted to life—the ennobling influence radiating from a vast task—when God's unfinished purposes are laid down level with human possibilities and human hands are bidden to finish the work.

Thus instead of living an idle pensioner on a divine largess, man is invested with the dignity of one who pays his own way.

In order to the enlargement and elevation of a soul, nothing is more potent than that a man should realize this partnership with his Creator not as a poetic fancy but as a matter-of-fact condition of prosaic daily life.

How vastly it must solemnize and dignify one's choice of an occupation in the world to perceive one's obligation to choose that particular form of livelihood in which—when all opportunities and abilities are considered—he believes he can do most to advance the welfare of his fellow men, in bodily, mental or religious progress.

And how vast an uplift it must be to anyone who takes up a day's labor, to bethink himself that he is not merely on that day getting money for himself and his dependents to live on, but primarily is doing God a service in the interest of humanity—for recompense of which he trusts to be granted that day his daily bread.

"Today I lend a hand to God"—by that consciousness might the best of all brotherhoods be established round the world—the "Brotherhood of God's Coworkers."

The humblest laborer of darkest Africa, together with the prince of all civilization, whoever he is, might be joined in that fraternity.

City Christmas Celebrations Never Before So Numerous

Public and municipal celebrations of Christmas were planned on a more extended scale this year than ever before. The municipal Christmas tree in New York was set up in Madison Square last week with elaborate electrical trimmings. Delegations from various choral societies were asked to sing yuletide carols. Last year's celebration in New York was so successful that the idea was adopted in many cities. In Chicago a charitable committee set up a huge tree, composed of seventy smaller trees, in Grant park north of the Art Institute, just off Michigan avenue. Invitations were sent to 25,000 poor children and real gifts were provided, besides the special program by grand opera singers and other musical experts. St. Louis, under the direction of the municipal recreation commission—something new in commissions—had several hundred evergreen trees scattered over two blocks surrounding a large central cedar in the widest street in the city adjoining the city hall square. Philadelphia, Pittsburg, Washington, Baltimore, Boston and Cleveland arranged public celebrations. Grand Rapids, Michigan, had a Christmas tree for all in one of the parks. A chorus of a thousand school children was organized.

Postoffices everywhere felt the burden of the workings of the Christmas spirit, notably in the heavy business done by the parcel post. Postoffice money orders for foreign countries were also reported to be larger than ever in number and in aggregate. In New York City alone during the period preceding Christmas 496,898 postal orders for nearly $8,000,000 were sent to Europe, a considerable increase over last year. One-quarter of the amount went to Great Britain, nearly as much to Italy, then came Russia and sixteen other countries. Other American cities and villages had the same story to tell. Here is another one of the "economic drains" that political alarmists sometimes point to as a peril, but in a way this export of funds is probably productive of international peace, good will and brotherhood feelings.

Christmas gifts to employees are still common in spite of the frequent clashes between labor unions and organizations of employers. For example, the gift of a $5 gold piece to each one of the 14,000 wage workers of the Interborough Rapid Transit Company of New York was reported, along with many other larger donations where the staff of workers was smaller. A good many corporations have adopted profit-sharing systems and will divide part of their year's earnings with their employees next month.

Congress Passes Vitally Important Currency Bill

Legislative victory number 2 was won by the Wilson administration last Friday, when the United States senate by a vote of 54 to 34 passed the Owen-Glass currency bill three months after it had been adopted by the lower house. Coming so soon after the triumphant enactment of the tariff law, it gave the President and his advisers a "merry Christmas" and it is hoped will give the country a happy and prosperous new year. "A political miracle" and "the greatest piece of constructive legislation since the civil war period" is the way the senate bill was hailed by Professor J. Laurence Laughlin, the noted economist of the University of Chicago, in a discussion on Saturday. His views coincide with the opinions of the Democratic and most of the independent newspapers of the country.

The law is designed to make both the currency and the credit system of the United States more elastic and responsive to the changing needs of the business of the country, and thereby prevent panics and times of financial stringency. The senate bill provides that this is to be accomplished through the medium of eight to twelve regional reserve banks to be located in as many different financial centers and controlled by a federal reserve board of seven members. Every national bank must subscribe to the capital of the reserve bank of its district an amount equal to 6 per cent of its own capital stock and surplus. Failing so to subscribe its charter will be annulled. If these compulsory bank subscriptions are insufficient to give ample capital to a regional reserve bank the public may be invited to subscribe, and if subscriptions are still inadequate the reserve board has power to allot stock to the government. Instead of currency being issued, as now, by the national banks, it is to be put out by the new reserve banks, and is to be based upon approved promissory notes or "commercial paper," backed by a 40 per cent gold reserve and guaranteed by the government. The reserve funds of the banks of the country are to be concentrated in these regiona reserve banks, and thus allow the individual banks to materially reduce their reserves, which will set free a very considerable volume of money for the commercial activities and constructive work of the country.

Directors of each regional reserve bank—which will deal with other banks and not with the general public—are to be elected by the constituent banks, three from their own directorates, three from men representing commerce, agriculture or some industrial pursuit and three appointed by the federal reserve board, but all shall be residents of the reserve district. The federal board itself, with its important supervisory and administrative powers, is to consist of the secretary of the treasury and six others to be appointed by the President, two of whom shall have had actual banking experience. Members of the board will receive $12,000 a year salary. The exact composition of the federal board was one of the points of difference between the house and senate which had to be settled in conference.

Although the machinery of the new act is complicated the end aimed at is simplicity and certainty. The senate provided that the new legislation should become effective "as soon as convenient," and the majority of bankers are apparently preparing to accept the law in a calm and hopeful spirit. Stock brokers and speculators, particularly in Wall and LaSalle streets, were reported to be joyously optimistic at the prospect that public doubt and uncertainty had been permanently dispelled.

Telephone-Telegraph Combine Agrees to Dissolve

Voluntary dissolution of the American Telephone and Telegraph Company, known as the telephone trust, was announced Saturday morning, to take place in accordance with proposals submitted by the company to Attorney General McReynolds and accepted by him in behalf of the government.

The corporation has promised promptly to dispose of its holdings of stock of the Western Union Telegraph Company; also not to acquire control of other or additional telephone companies. Of special importance to the public is an offer to make arrangements by which independent telephone lines, outside the Bell combine, may have access to the big corporation's toll lines, something they have not had in the past with some exceptions. The agreement as a whole will prevent litigation in the United States courts to dissolve the corporation under the Sherman antitrust act, and is expected to restore competition in the telephone service of the entire country.

President Wilson in a letter to the attorney general expressed gratification at the result of the "peace negotiations" between the department of justice and the corporation. The President says he gains the impression that the business men of the country are sincerely desirous of conforming with the law and he is glad to cooperate with them in complete frankness, significantly adding: "So long as we are dealt with in this spirit, we can help build up the business of the country upon sound and permanent lines." Department of justice officials are quoted to the effect that "big business" has concluded that it is better to follow the Sherman law than to fight it.

The protracted negotiations which resulted in the settlement were conducted by Mr. McReynolds and his assistant, G. C. Todd, for the government, and for the company by Theodore N. Vail, president, and N. C. Kingsbury, vice president. In finally submitting its plans for approval the company insisted that it wished to place its affairs "beyond criticism." A year ago the authorized capital stock of the American Telephone and Telegraph Company was $500,000,000. The Western Union's outstanding stock is $100,000,000. Telephone dividends have been 8 per cent and telegraph dividends 3 per cent. This capitalization is exclusive of bonded indebtedness.

Postmaster General Wants Public Ownership

Government ownership of the telegraph and telephone lines of the country was urged in the first annual report of Postmaster General Burleson last week. Two years ago the same thing was called for by Postmaster General Hitchcock, a Republican, in a report to President Taft and to Congress, and bills have been introduced in Congress in the past providing for the same thing, but Mr. Burleson attacks the problem with more evident earnestness than has been done in the past.

Mr. Burleson cites the successful operation of the parcel post as a sufficient guaranty that the postoffice department can handle further nationwide business of great magnitude and importance. He reminds Congress that the first telegraph line in the country was maintained and operated as part of the postal system, and the monopolistic nature of the service makes it vitally important, he believes, that these two utilities be conducted by Uncle Sam. Rates would be based on actual cost of operation plus interest and sinking fund provisions only. Estimates of the cost of acquiring all the private wires vary from $900,000,000 to $2,000,000,000 and up.

It is probable that the truce just made between the government and the telephone-telegraph combine will delay the postmaster general's plans or at least lessen for a time public pressure in behalf of government ownership.

Mexican President Has Financial Problems

Financial needs of the Mexican government are being brought home to Provisional President Huerta through the desertion of some of his soldiers because of lack of pay and the falling due next month of a large amount of interest on outstanding bonds. The banking situation in the City of Mexico was bad, with little prospect of immediate betterment. Bills of state banks were refused acceptance, and there were runs on some of the banks. A committee of bankers has been wrestling with the financial problems raised by the unsettled state of the country, but was unable to propose any solution. Some success is reported to have attended efforts for new foreign loans.

Tampico was again threatened with attack by two rebel armies. The rebel general Zapata, who has long been operating in the south and in the near vicinity of Mexico City, was more than usually active. General Mercado, commander of the federal troops in the north, was deposed and thereupon fled.

General Villa remained in the city of Chihuahua, where he "officially" announced that he had confiscated for the constitutionalist cause all the vast properties of the Terrazas and Creel families, estimated to be worth as much as a billion of dollars, lands included. Two-thirds of all the property in the state of Chihuahua belong to the Terrazas family, their lands extending for 200 miles along the railroad south of Juarez. The Creels, who are related, own most of the banking interests in northern Mexico. In addition to this seizure Villa also appropriated the silver mines of General Pascual Orozco and the mining interest of federals, with considerable bullion, which he was unable to turn into coin. Last Sunday he issued orders against looting and had six of his soldiers publicly shot to enforce military discipline. It developed that Villa had been shrewd enough not to antagonize the American consul or other Americans at Chihuahua as first reported.

Chinese President May Dispense with Parliament

President Yuan Shih Kai thinks he can get along very well without any parliament and, probably at his instigation, the civil and military governors of all the provinces have said so in a petition or round robin addressed to the president. This remarkable document, made public last week, advised the definite termination of the parliament for the reason that it has enacted no important law in the seven months of its existence and, to quote, "will not do so if it be permitted to continue for a hundred years." The round robin continues, vaguely yet ominously:

"Vice President Li Yuen Heng and other prominent citizens of the republic cannot continue to remain silent while the country goes to destruction. The administrative council now convened in Peking is a more useful body than the old parliament. The council is similar to the convention formed by the thirteen states which assisted George Washington in the revision of the American constitution.

"We and the whole of the Chinese people disapprove of the conduct of the bad members of parliament. Foreigners likewise disapprove of it. Therefore the president of the republic need not hesitate."

"Hesitate" to do what? That question was not answered in last week's dispatches, but the Associated Press hinted that it was to strengthen Yuan's hands for further autocratic measures. The administrative council alluded to was formed by the president last month and consists of seventy-one members, including cabinet officers, provincial governors and other appointees of Yuan's. Meetings are held in the palace at Peking.

The allusion to George Washington is historically inaccurate, for Washington never displaced a Congress elected by the people in favor of a hand-picked group of executive favorites, and Washington distinctly declined opportunities to become a dictator. But George Washington had a different kind of human material with which to deal.

India, South Africa and the British Race Problem

Ill feeling and hostility of the natives against the British government in India have been considerably allayed by a recent speech by Viceroy Hardinge at Madras, but none the less the British empire's race problem grows more acute. Lord Hardinge strongly defended the Hindu immigrants in South Africa who are practicing both "passive" and violent resistance to laws which they regard as unjust and oppressive, which for the first time in over fifty years brought the Hindus into armed collision with the white man. The viceroy frankly expressed his sympathy and his disapproval of the repressive measures which brought on the trouble. General Botha, the South African premier, took exception to Lord Hardinge's protest, and challenged the latter to investigate cases of alleged cruelty by British or Boers. The imperial government at London has not ventured to attempt to dictate to the great self-governing dominions what immigrants shall be admitted nor what local laws shall be passed, for the statesmen at home do not care to strain the loose bonds that bind the empire together.

One of the chief grounds of complaint in South Africa is the poll tax—or "blood tax," so called—of $15 which is imposed on East Indian coolies brought in as indentured laborers, after their term of indenture has expired. If the coolie can manage to return to India or if he renews his labor contract he is exempt, but if he wants to settle in Natal as a free man he must pay the tax, which can be collected by summary legal process. The collections began in 1900 and since then friction and irritation have been increasing, especially as a way was found to send men and women to jail if they did not pay the impost. The government of the South African Union is charged with failing to fulfill a promise to repeal the tax. The coolies were also angered by a law which forbade them to move from one province to another.

Another prime cause of trouble was the barring out of Hindu and Moslem wives of resident laborers on the ground that their marriages were either polygamous or illegal because performed in accordance with the rites of a religion which permits polygamy.

A delegation of prominent East Indians lately called on Lord Crewe, secretary of state for India, in London, and he suggested an inquiry as to the treatment their race has had and is receiving. But Lord Crewe said he could not guarantee that East Indians would be freely admitted to any part of the empire on the basis of their British citizenship—which was the thing they asked.

Attempts of the imperial government to placate the aroused wrath of India—only partially allayed by Viceroy Hardinge—are rendered more difficult by the news that Canada wants to shut out or further restrict immigration from India to British Columbia. The rest of the British empire is willing to have the Asiatics stay at home and face famine and want, but like bees in a hive they insist on swarming.

Britain's race problem is not limited to South Africa, for Australia and New Zealand have also declared for "a white man's country," and this runs counter to the spirit of England's alliance with Japan.

Scientific Aspects of the Use of Alcohol

The American Society for the Study of Alcohol and Other Narcotics held its forty-third annual meeting in Philadelphia this month and developed fresh evidence of the damaging effects of the use of alcoholic beverages. Even one daily drink for fathers was said to have been the cause of epilepsy in children. Two drinks of whisky, it was conceded, might sometimes be absorbed without immediate harm, but every drink after the second is an excess which cannot be worn off. Such excess finds a place in the nerve centers, and the general effect is to hurry the degenerating process akin to old age.

Colonel L. Mervin Maus, chief surgeon of the eastern division of the United States army, declared the growing use of liquor in the form of cocktails among young men and women a menace to the integrity of the nation. Dr. John D. Quackenbos of New York, a scientist of experience, who spoke of "The Psychical Treatment of Inebriety," said he had found it almost useless to attempt to cure women addicted to the drink habit.

Protection of Wild Animals Urged on Nations

An international congress for the protection of wild animals recently met in Bern, Switzerland, on the invitation of the Swiss government. Seventeen countries, including the United States, were represented. The congress appointed an international committee, to have headquarters at Basel, which will endeavor to create public opinion and promote legislation designed to stop wholesale destruction of big game and various species of rare animals. Seals, whales, elephants, birds of paradise and egrets were particularly noted as in need of protection if they are not to be exterminated.

Opposition is expected from the business interests engaged in the fur, feather, whaling and ivory trades, which enlist millions of dollars and thousands of workers.

Week of Prayer Program from England

Since the decease of its secretary, Dr. Leander T. Chamberlain, who died in California last spring after a long illness, the American Evangelical Alliance has come close to disorganization. Consequently it has failed this winter to put forth its customary program for the Week of Prayer to be observed between the first and second Sundays of January. Dr. George Alexander, Presbyterian, the chairman of the committee, and Dr. George U. Wenner, Lutheran, the secretary, advise all who inquire for Week of Prayer topics to follow the program put out for 1914 by the British Alliance. A few copies of this have reached America, and The Contient herewith produces the substance of the British recommendations. The suggestions cover the days from Sunday, January 4, to Saturday, January 10.

Sunday—Texts: John 17:21, I. Cor. 1:10, Acts 1:8, Mark 16:15, Rev. 11:15.

Monday—Thanksgiving and Humiliation: Praise that the Lord reigns and there is still set before the church an open door for the gospel; humiliation on account of un-Christian standards in society, the failure of Christendom to provide adequate means for the Lord's work, and the prevailing desecration of the Lord's day. II. Sam. 7:18-29; Psalm 96; Tim. 3; Rev. 3:7-22.

An Innovation in Christmas Posters for Billboards

Tuesday—The Church Universal: Humiliation on account of continued lack of unity; prayer that the church may be one in spirit and operate in the world as one, that Christian faith may be held as once delivered to the saints, that there may be a return to the Bible, and that Christians may consecrate themselves and their wealth to the service of God. Eph. 1:15-23; Eph. 3:10-21; I. Cor. 2:1-5; Col. 1:18-24; II. John.

Wednesday—Nations and Their Rulers: Thanks for the measure of success attending efforts to suppress the opium traffic and for the awakening of the churches to the perils of immorality; humiliation on account of international jealousies; prayer for world peace and for all public servants; that those in authority may be in subjection to the rule of the King of kings; that un-Christian social conditions may be removed. I. Tim. 2:1-8; I. Pet. 2:13-27; Psalm 24; Psalm 138.

Thursday—Missions: Prayer for a sense of Christian responsibility in treatment of subject races, for blessing on all missionary agencies, for a simpler faith in God's ability to redeem the world, for churches in heathen lands and a larger increase of native agents; that mass movements in India may be guided into right channels, that the church may take advantage of the willingness of China to hear the gospel, and that the Moslem menace may be overcome by the power of the Holy Spirit. Matt. 28:18-20; Acts 4:31-37; Gal. 1:6-11; Romans 10:11-15; II. Thess. 3:1-5.

Friday—Families and Colleges: Prayer for parents that their training of their children may be effective, for increase of daily family worship, for teachers and all educational institutions, for Sunday school superintendents and Bible class leaders and for the early conversion of the young. Psalm 103:17; Psalms 119:9-11 and 130; II. Tim. 3:15-17; Josh. 1:1-9 and 24:15; Prov. 1:7-9 and 15:33.

Saturday—Home Missions and the Jews: Humiliation that Christianity is still so little in possession of the great centers of population; prayer that the Jews may soon see Jesus as Christ, and that the power of the Holy Ghost may accompany all evangelistic and social work in cities, towns and villages and homes of Christendom. Zech. 12:9-10; Romans 11:1-15; Psalms 2 and 67; Is. 60:1-3.

Billboard Owners Preach by Great Picture

The most remarkable and perhaps one might fairly say the most significant innovation of America's 1913 Christmas season has been the appearance of Christmas posters on the billboards of American cities the last two weeks before Christmas. This display is a huge twenty-four-sheet lithograph twenty feet long by nine feet high, picturing the adoration of the infant Saviour by shepherds and magi at Bethlehem—the work of Edward Volkert, chief artist of the United States Printing and Lithograph Company in Cincinnati. His work is not wholly original but a harmonization of ideas drawn from several classic painters of Christian history who have treated the Christmas theme. The values of the picture are highly artistic and truly reverent. As an evidence of sincere intent to make the poster a real means of religious influence, there is lettered in its margin the text, "And when they came into the house, they saw the young child with Mary his mother, and they fell down and worshiped him." And across the face of the painting itself run the words: "Ask your Sunday school teacher to tell you the story."

This whole Christmas display is the result of an actual moral and even religious revival which occurred in the national convention of the Poster Advertising Association at Atlantic City last summer. This gathering was composed of representatives of the great firms which own the billboards in American cities, and these delegates faced, with what amounted to a profound conviction of sin, the common public accusation that they were lending their property and influence to advertising vicious agencies in theatrical and other lines. Their penitence took the form of arrangements to clean up the billboards and purify them at least of obscenity. But they were not content with this negative measure. An educational committee was appointed to devise some way by which the billboard owners might have a part in the moral uplift of the country. It was this committee which developed the idea of a Christmas poster, and which determined that it should spread not mere conventional sentiments of Christmas good will, but a direct religious message.

The plan laid out for this strange new evangelism contemplated the display of the great Christmas lithograph in every city of the United States and Canada of more than 3,000 population. And practically the project has been realized. The larger cities got as many as fifty copies apiece. The space which the various billboard owners donated for the purpose was worth $25,000.

Of the many accumulating tokens of a deeper religious sentiment pervading the nation, particularly at this Christmas season, surely none can pronounce a more positive assurance of optimism than this voluntary action on the part of a commercial organization which heretofore has been regarded as indifferent to moral considerations. It might almost be said that the advertising billboards with this impressive picture blazoned on them have become heralds of the kingdom of God.

Interlocking Wheels

THERE IS a story of a little child allowed to carry his father's watch, who, for the first time, caught a glimpse of the works and was greatly distressed to observe that some wheels were running in a direction opposite to the others. He thought such a confusion must have come about through some fault of his own in handling the watch, and brought it with deep contrition to his father. It had never come to his child mind that progress comes, and ends are served, by reverse wheels.

The hope is that his lesson stood him in hand in larger things. Certainly many of us have had to see that the best way to gain some ends is to have wheels that interlock and run against each other. Professor Santayana in his critique of Bergson's philosophy counts it one of Bergson's weaknesses that he makes no provision for a reversal of movement as a method of advance. It is not proved, he thinks, that progress is in a straight line, nor does the fact that one thing follows another prove that it is a better thing. It may not be better. It may be only a reversing of the wheels by which the world keeps God's time.

Our outlook on the world is much that of the child. We cannot see how there is room in a world of God's love for wheels that go backward. How is the fact of sorrow to be justified, since God loves us all? How can God be our Father when things so manifestly have a way of going dead against us? Ought not everything to move straight on? The confusion troubles us. Some of us grow so troubled that we question if there is any order at all. One of the voices in Ecclesiastes, like one in Tennyson's poem of "The Two Voices," declares that we have no right to suppose that personal character makes any difference. A stone wall would as soon fall on the apostle Paul as on Judas Iscariot, and when a big ship goes down it does not matter in the least who is aboard. We should think it would not be so in a world of order. The wheels ought to run in the same direction.

We have the same problem in the permission of evil and its results. How could sin get into a world which God is governing? Dr. Hitchcock used to say in his magnificent metaphor: "Nor should any effort be made to get at the genesis of moral evil. God's shoulder was not against the door; sin pushed." But that does not help us out of the difficulty. Why was not God's shoulder against the door when sin pushed? We are quite sure ours would have been. Once here, why is it allowed to remain and to ruin so many who are not responsible for it? And we are not content to be told that sin is "good in the making." We know our own is not. It is just bad and hurtful, and left to itself it does nothing but evil. The part of it which we can see overruled into the service of good is as nothing to the part which goes unwhipped of justice and unyoked to the chariot of human service. The wheels are not running straight forward.

Well, the largest trouble with us is that we are in the midst of the works. Imagine a midget small enough to creep into your watch case, with no idea of the dial, nor of its three hands moving at differing speeds and working together to tell the hour. He will see a hopeless confusion of movements, and so far as he can trace them, quite up to the underside of the dial, they follow no consistent plan. Wheels run against wheels, speeds differ; at least three results are produced which seem little connected with each other. That one of the outgoing pinions is for the hour hand, another for the minute hand and a third for the second hand means nothing to him. He cannot get order or system out of it from any point of view which he is able to take. Then imagine him assured of you, of your reason, of your wisdom; imagine him coming to feel that this apparent chaos of movement has an upper side and serves a purpose beyond his knowledge.

All that would be somewhat our own position. We are in the works. It is told us only that we have a part there, and that the whole is in hands wiser and better than ours, that it is serving a purpose beyond our knowing; with this added assurance, that we shall some day be permitted to look down on the dial and understand what all that movement was accomplishing. The wheels of God's plan do interlock. They run against each other. What of that? Even in one little experience this is often the way of progress. Out of the interplay of forces the omniscient God is able to bring the forward movement of his purpose. What he permits and what he performs have their place, be sure of that, and there is no chaos in the rational world.

The Age Turns Back to the Book

You hear men say, don't you, that this age is drifting away from the Bible? Well, don't you believe it for a minute. The age is coming back to the Bible. It has tried other things and found them wanting. And prophetic seers in the world itself—not simply in the church—are saying so.

There was never an age before when a purely secular voice bore a truer-ringing heart tribute to the Book of all books than Collier's Weekly printed editorially in its Christmas issue. The whole of it is worth reprinting here, for it is but another evidence of that contemporary hunger after religion which Winston Churchill has told of in the Christmas Century. Collier's says, under the heading "Back to the Bible":

> "Certain of our wise men of today have shaded away sin till it becomes an expression of temperament. They tell us that we sin because our grandfather sinned, and because our home is situated in the wrong block. These are clever words of clever comforters, and surely they ought to wipe away forever the tears from our eyes. But they do not speak to human need. They leave the life blighted and the heart ashamed. They leave the sinning one to continue in despair. He does not ask that his sin shall be explained away. He wishes forgiveness and a fresh start. In the Book, which is not read as once it was, there are no soft words about sin. But the way out is shown. And not only is forgiveness offered in this Book, but man's need of comfort is met. There is comfort in plenty. These writers knew the human heart. They saw man broken by his toil and grief. And for this, too, they had the answer. They told of a Being of love, hidden just back of this rude and temporary universe. This love, they said, is conscious of how the littlest child and the old man are sick at heart for one to come close to their loneliness. When again will any company of writers say the things they know in such telling words, such pictures of humble life—the boy far away from the faces of his home and far gone in shame—such true stories of lowly devotion breaking through into beauty? Much is swept away between us and them, but not one accent of Naomi's voice is lost to us, and still the 'Turn again, my daughters,' is as wistful as when it breathed through the alien corn. What richer consolation are we hungry for that we turn from Judea? Has the human heart changed under the wear of the centuries so that sin no longer seeks forgiveness, and grief has no need of a comforter? Have our ships sailed so far that they have revealed to us a braver continent than the fields where pain once reigned? Is our science so acute that it has banished failure from man's life? Is man's heart at last self-sufficient and all-sufficing?"

"Layman" Republishes Convincing Tithe Pleas

Thomas Kane, that beloved Presbyterian elder of Chicago whose praise is in all the churches for his lifework in writing and circulating literature on tithing—under the modest pseudonym of "Layman"—has just reissued his popular pamphlets now bound together in two paper-covered booklets. All of the pamphlets have been carefully revised, but are essentially the same material which in the last thirty years has convinced so many thousands of Christians that they are under obligation to God to devote not less than a tenth of their incomes to his kingdom's purposes. In booklet form Mr. Kane's message will be somewhat less fugitive than in the leaflets heretofore put forth, and it is to be expected that many other thousands will yet read it, be convinced and begin tithing.

"What We Owe and Why We Owe It," "What We Owe and How to Pay It," "What We Owe and the Results of Paying It" and "Christian Service for Laymen"—the familiar arguments which have been so effective in years past—are all here, in one or the other of the new booklets. Besides Mr. Kane has included some of his later writings, "What We Owe and Objections to Paying It," "What We Owe and the Results of Teaching It" and (particularly delightful) "Tithing Reminiscences," wherein Mr. Kane tells his own experiences in practicing and inculcating tithing—the whole story spiced throughout with tasteful bits of that wholesome everyday philosophy of his for which he is famous among his friends.

In advocating the tithe as the biblical method for financing the work of Christ's kingdom, Mr. Kane has never been betrayed into that legalistic temper which in many pleas for tithing seems more in harmony with the Mosaic than the Christian epoch of religion. But he does firmly believe that tithing is a law permanently written in the spiritual nature of man to which grace ought with all gladness to respond. The tithe is therefore owed to God—for which reason Mr. Kane will never speak of giving tithes but always of paying tithes. And the blessing of God in both temporal and spiritual things follows tithe-paying, he holds, not by special providence but by the regular operation of God's law in the universe just as all natural effects ever follow their causes. This is the doctrine which "Layman's" writings attest not only by argument but by a wonderful collection of testimonies from Christians who have tried it in every part of the world. All his pamphlets are Christian literature of a singular reality, and whoever disseminates them is not simply helping solve the problem of church finance but serving also the devotional spirit of the churches.

Mr. Kane himself in his cheerful—almost merry—old age, scarcely a whit declined as yet from the vigor of his prime, might alone stand as an excellent personal proof that the tithing principle has something in it that's good to live by. There is a characteristic note of contentment and cheer in the very last paragraph of his "Reminiscences," where he says that if he could choose any part of his life to live over again, he would take the years since he was 70. How many old men can or would say that?

Liberia Needs Sane Counsel Just Now

The devilish persistency of the liquor business is in evidence again on the west coast of Africa. The chain of British colonies stretching down the west coast of Africa have agreed on a new law which forbids all liquor distillation under the British flag anywhere in that part of Africa. The debauchery of the native tribes has got so bad that everybody sees it is prohibition or ruin for those colonies.

But the distillers who are thus being invited out of business have no grace to be ashamed of the trouble they have caused. Instead they are determined to keep the mischief up. They have got together and offered a big bribe to the independent negro state of Liberia for permission to establish distilleries within its limits. From that location they could sell just as much whisky as ever to the coast tribes. And Liberia is so desperately poor that the big license money is terribly tempting.

It is well known that the United States has always watched over Liberia, and Englishmen concerned in the problem are asking anxiously if American citizens can't stir up their own government to advise the Liberians to have nothing to do with the vile and dishonorable scheme. Undoubtedly some encouragement is needed to stiffen them against the temptation. Mr. Bryan at the head of the department of state ought to hear from a good many of his fellow citizens in the next week assurances that action in this line on his part will be pleasing to his admirers.

Quite Too Much Praise of Caprice

The Continent does not believe that S. S. McClure, the eminent magazine editor, would consciously write a thing to weaken the wills of young men beginning life. But such certainly is the unhappy effect of the complacent if not boastful way in which he dwells on the weakness of his own youth in autobiographical sketches now appearing in the magazine that bears his name.

Mr. McClure tells how in his years of struggle to get through college—Knox College in Illinois—he ran close to starvation in almost incredible want for one whole winter simply because he had made up his mind not to work at such common occupations as sawing stove wood and tending furnaces. Of this work he had had plenty the winter before and had lived in comfort, and he well knew that he could have plenty of it again. But because the whim had seized him to think he was past such menial tasks he preferred to starve and freeze rather than turn back to such drudgery.

Putting down the fact of his folly is of course only candor on the writer's part, and an engaging candor, too. But a man who knows life so deeply and well as Mr. McClure ought to have realized his duty, for the sake of youthful readers at least, to have emphasized the silliness of the whole idle freak. But instead of apology, Mr. McClure virtually commends his own bad example by writing:

"Of course it was very illogical in me to adopt this mode of living when I needed money as much as ever. But life is illogical. I believe that most people who believe that their lives are moved according to a plan, carefully made and consistently followed, deceive themselves. There are exceptions, but caprice and chance have their way with a good many of us."

This is bad doctrine—thoroughly bad—to be read into any youthful brain. It is true that not many people are able to pursue through life a consistent plan which realizes all the hopes on which they have launched out in early years. But this fact doesn't invite surrender to caprice. Nor is the habit of indulging nonsensical tastes and distastes any sort of way to cure the bafflements which everybody has to experience. No matter how disappointed one may be in hopes and purposes, the road out to happiness and achievement again always lies along the way of common-sense living—rational doing of the things which judgment and not whim proposes. Mr. McClure himself has succeeded by his sense and not by his folly. And like all the rest of mankind he would have succeeded still better by the use of more sense. Out on all this praise of caprice! The youth can't always follow his plan, but he can always follow sensible principles.

Religion That Made a Glorious Heroine

The biography of Florence Nightingale just published reveals a side of life in one of the world's greatest women which the world that praised her has little appreciated. Her fame has been the fame of a wonderful lover of humanity, but what humanity has not appreciated is that she was also a wonderful lover of God. And she loved mankind so gloriously and persistently only because she loved God so utterly. Her biographer stresses nothing else so much as the fact that her intense religion is all that can explain her unequaled philanthropic career.

With all that, however, the great Crimean nurse was not an orthodox believer. She objected to much of the traditional theology of Christendom. But she did profoundly believe that Jesus Christ died on the cross for her sins and she passionately felt her personal need for his atonement and his grace. Moreover, she was deeply conscious that she had been personally called by the divine Spirit to her lifework as a nurse. In her own writings she sets down May 7, 1852, as the well remembered day when she received "a call from God to be a savior"—a call which she fulfilled literally in adopting the then untried profession of nursing the sick.

That word of hers, by the way—"called to be a savior"—lets a shaft of revealing daylight through the glib old objection that the idea of conversion is selfish. Whatever the idea of it may have been in various times and circumstances—people have all sorts of ideas—the genuine experience of conversion certainly has never been selfish. It has never failed to create in the soul a poignant desire for saving and helping somebody else. And real conversion holds, too. It produces in the life just what Florence Nightingale herself later described—"the ecstasy of single-heartedness" for such service as will carry Christ's benevolence to the heart of a sinning and suffering world.

—The Anti-Saloon League has come nowadays to a high enough state of organization to be able to swing its heaviest forces wherever the battle goes heaviest. This is an enormous military advantage. An example is the transfer of W. H. Anderson from being league superintendent for Maryland to be superintendent in New York. Anderson has had a tremendous battle-training in this war, and the rough-and-tumble of it has hammered out in him just about the stoutest, hardiest and coolest personality in all the Anti-Saloon lineup. Moreover, the liquor folks have been poking at him for a dozen years to find a flaw in his moral constitution, and haven't yet "got anything on him." So the league very naturally assigns him its hardest job. In Illinois first Anderson laid the foundations for what has become, all in all, the most successful state league in the country. In Maryland later he has taken a state which literally cared for none of these things and led it up to the point where state prohibition is acknowledged by even the liquor men to be an imminent possibility. May Mr. Anderson do as much comparatively in New York.

—Brewers in Pittsburg have been inviting infidel lecturers to speak at theater meetings in their city. In confidential letters to men engaged in the trade they appeal for the attendance at these meetings of all saloon proprietors and employees, in order to make the events as imposing as possible and give the public an idea that there is lots of sentiment behind the infidel movement. The object frankly stated is to throw a wet blanket over Billy Sunday's campaign which is to be carried on in Pittsburg through January and half of February. This man Sunday, these frightened conspirators tell their friends, has damaged the liquor business incalculably in other cities where he has been, and if Pittsburg dealers care anything for their profits they must stand together and try in every way to counteract his efforts. Which is a fine compliment to Sunday and a sample of the devil's futility, too.

—The amount of space which the daily papers gave the late national convention of Methodist men at Indianapolis is nothing to wonder at after you know the publicity arrangements which Ralph Welles Keeler worked out for that meeting. Newspaper correspondents present were furnished with typewritten minutes of the proceedings complete—every word spoken in speech or discussion fully written out—inside of ten minutes following the close of any session. To accomplish this Mr. Keeler employed four stenographers and fourteen rapid typists—but it was worth it.

The True Test: "I Would Die for Christ"

BY JAMES G. K. McCLURE

AT THE TIME of the Boxer rebellion a Chinese, while the sword was held against his throat by his threateners, was asked "Are you a Christian?" He answered "Yes."

The remarkable feature of his case was this: Three times he had appeared before the church authorities and had requested to be admitted into church membership. Three times the authorities had asked him questions which involved dogmatic replies, and because the man could not answer such questions in language that was satisfactory, the authorities once, again, and still again had told the man he was not fit to become a member of the church and bear the name of Christian.

But when the crucial hour and the ultimate test of his devotion to Christ broke upon him he did not hesitate an instant to meet the shame and the peril of bearing Christ's name, and to face even death itself for the Master of his soul.

A Lay Worker with the Zeal for God

Dr. Charles Hodge had a story which he loved to tell. Not only did every generation of classes attending the theological seminary hear it from his lips, but every generation of classes heard it repeatedly from his lips. It was the story of a theological student who went before his presbytery to be made a minister. To that end an examination was necessary. The examination revealed that the man was not very acute in his scholastic and theological knowledge, and the presbytery declined to license him. Waiting a proper time he again sought licensure, but the presbytery still found him incompetent according to their standards.

What did the man do? He had given himself to foreign missions. Acting on his own counsel and going forth at his own charges he went to the foreign field. There he did whatever he could do in connection with a mission station. He was not an ordained minister; he was what the world calls a lay worker. So he continued for years. "And," Dr. Hodge would say while the fire glinted in his eyes as he said it, "the most influential person for God in the entire station was that refused man, because his life was so consistent and so helpful, because he was so Christlike."

That is an instructive scene described by Ian Maclaren when Mary Macfarlane appears before the session of the Drumtochty church. The elders, acknowledged as men of God by the entire community, are gathered in solemn assemblage and the applicant for church membership presents herself. The girl breaks down utterly in her examination for the sacrament, so that not even the gentlest of the elders could get a correct answer. Rising in great confusion and sorrow she said:

"A' see it wudna be fit for the like o' me tae gae forrit, but a' had set ma hert on't; it wes the last thing He askit o' His freends," and she left the session meeting before anyone could bid her stay.

"Moderator," said the elder who heretofore had been hardest to satisfy but who lately had received a baptism of God's Spirit, "it is a great joy for me to move that Mary Macfarlane get her token, and I will be wishing that we all had her warrant, oh, yes, for there is no warrant like love."

The true test! how difficult it often is to find it. Once I went with a girl of 18 who was too timid to go alone before the session of her church. The minute she was asked about herself, about her faith and her experience, she burst into tears; she was incapable of any answer whatever. What should the session do? Without delay they interpreted her presence before them as indicative of Christian purpose, they saw in her tears an evidence of humility before God; and they cordially welcomed her to a church membership which she glorified under complicated and difficult circumstances for all the years until she received the crown of everlasting life.

The Decisive Attitude of Soul and Character

Whoever can say "I would die for Christ" meets the true test. God and the angels surely believe in such an one and extend welcome. Here is where Satan fails; he could repeat, if he were asked to do so, the statements descriptive of God as revealed in Father, Son and Holy Spirit, and descriptive, too, of holy Scripture—"the devils also believe and tremble." But he could not say "I would die for Him"; he could not say "I have set my heart on obeying Him," and thus he would fail at the very point that is decisive of character and of destiny.

More and more as we travel forward in the road of Christian experience and we find the kingdom of Jesus Christ taking deeper and deeper possession of our being are we inclined to magnify the place and the significance of devotion of soul to God, wherever it is found. The bruised reed God does not break and the smoking flax he does not quench if only the heart is true to him. It is very little that the most scholarly of us positively knows about matters that are not distinctly formulated in Scripture, and it is certain that even the wisest of us are mistaken in some of our assertions. How pitiful it seems when neither Toplady, breathing God in his "Rock of Ages," nor Charles Wesley, breathing the same God in his "Jesus, Lover of My Soul," can feel the other has an honored place in the progress of the kingdom! And how pitiful it is when, the hosts of evil being so many, so subtle and so powerful, noble lives burning with desire to bless the world in the name of Jesus Christ are not welcomed to fellowship in the army of God! The surest corrective for misunderstanding essential truth is the loving attempt to bring God to the souls of mankind. There is nothing like the service of God to make us know and love him. It is always and everywhere true that walking in his light is the method of seeing light.

The Christ-Man the Need of the Earth

A missionary of capacity and of wide vision after fifty years of labor in Turkey comes back to study the religious life of America. Previously he has been studying the religious life of the rest of the earth. What is the result of his study? He voices it in these words: "Everywhere I see the need of the Christ-man in the church. You in America need, every one of you, to be a Christ-man. The Christ behind the man, the Christ in the man, is the one hope and the sure hope of America. The Christ-man is our need in Turkey and in all the earth. Let each Christian everywhere be a Christ-man, and there is no problem of Christianity."

Here, then, is the true test; not intellectual understanding, not formulated assertion, but readiness to live and die for the God and Father of the Lord Jesus Christ.

SHADOWS

A PROSE POEM

PSALMS 91:1

I have lived under the shadows of thy wings, O death,
And in the shadow lies the balm of healing.
I have looked into thy great gray face, and I am not afraid.
Is it gray with evening light that portends the blackness of midnight and despair?
Or is it the gray of morning before the dawn—the dawn of an infinite day?
Thy wings are strong and they beat about me,
But the healing of their shadows has made my soul strong,
Strong unto life, for thou hast no fear for me;
Thou holdest all my beloved safe in the hollow of thy hands,
And I know that in thy keeping I, too, shall be free,
For beyond the deep shadows of death lies the eternal sunshine of life;
There are the secret places of the Most High
And he that dwelleth there abideth under the shadow of the Almighty.

Part of the Pearl Diving Fleet Lying Off the Harbor of Kuweit, Arabia

Where the "Smoke Ships" Will Come

Kuweit, Probable Terminus of the Politically Important Bagdad Railway, the Coming Highway of the Nations from the Persian Gulf to Europe

BY SAMUEL M. ZWEMER

[Dr. Zwemer, who has come back from Cairo, Egypt, to attend the approaching convention of the Student Volunteer Movement in Kansas City, is noted as a foremost Christian missionary to Moslems. He is a fellow of the Royal Geographical Society and has been an extensive traveler. He was ordained by the Reformed Church, and from 1891 to 1905 was stationed at various points in Arabia. In 1906 he organized the Mohammedan Missionary Conference, which was held in Cairo. He is editor of The Moslem World magazine and author of authoritative books. In this article he shows himself a keen observer of commercial conditions and international cross-currents.]

Bird's-Eye View of the City of Kuweit from the American Mission House

I VISITED Sheik Mobarrek, the native ruler of Kuweit, shortly after his accession to power in May, 1902; very few people outside of the Persian gulf country were acquainted at that time with even the name of the town, much less with its strategic importance in international politics. Nowadays leading articles are appearing in The London Times, the Russian press, the leading German papers, and especially also in the official journal of Turkey, El Tanin. The latter paper, in a series of articles by Ismael Hakki Bey, declares that Kuweit is officially a Turkish canton and to all intents and purposes Ottoman territory, but Great Britain, by special correspondence and reference to blue books, insists that her claim of suzerainty over Kuweit is paramount. This change is another indication of the new problems in the Nearer East. It may perhaps be open to question whether Kuweit will become the commercial terminus of the Bagdad railway, but if ever the railway is opened even as far as Busrah, Kuweit, because of its importance and its natural harbor, will always have the advantage over any city on the Shatt-el-Arab because the bar at the river delta will always be an obstacle to the navigation of large steamers. No one is more conscious of the future importance of this little port on the gulf than Sheik Mobarrek himself. I remember how keen he was on the occasion of my first visit to point out to me where the "smoke ships" would lie at anchor and where the railway trains would discharge their cargoes at a distance of two bowshots from his palace.

Mobarrek is a well-preserved man of middle age, with keen, restless eyes, Bedouin features, broad forehead and scant beard. His reception room, as well as his whole bearing and attitude toward Europeans, gives proof that he believes in modern progress. Plush chairs and sofas in great plenty were arranged around the walls and afforded a squatting ground for barefooted Bedouins and other retainers. The walls of his old reception room were gayly painted to match a gaudy brussels carpet and a floral ceiling made of blanket calico, while two marble-top tables and a huge clock completed the furniture of a room that is open daily for the reception of any and every guest who comes to seek the favor of the executive. Since the time of my first visit, Mobarrek has grown in power and influence, and the town itself has also spread far outside its old walls. Its trade is steadily increasing, and the sheik is growing rich. It is reputed that he is able to put between ten and fifteen thousand fighting men in the field. He has bought a fine yacht, and often goes to stay with Sheik Khazall, another powerful Arab ruler of Mohammerah in Persia. In fact Sheik Mobarrek is very wise in keeping on good terms with as many of the neighboring powers and petty Arab chiefs as possible. He flies the Turkish flag, but does not admit Turkish suzerainty; the flag, he says, represents the religion of Islam!

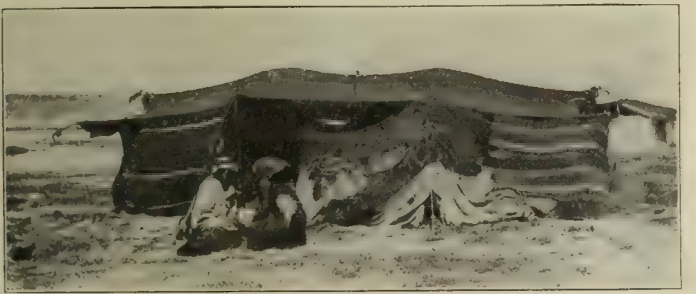
When Lord Curzon visited him and gave him a sword of honor he described himself as having become a military officer of the British empire. At the same time he is very keen in guarding his own rights of sovereignty as an independent ruler, and the future history of Kuweit will depend as much upon Sheik Mobarrek as upon the efforts of diplomats of the European powers interested in it.

A description of Kuweit as it is today and a brief resume of its political history during the past hundred years will prove of interest to all those who are studying world politics, and who are following in the press the three-cornered struggle between Germany, England and Russia for their share in the coming highway of the nations which will lead from the Persian gulf up the Tigris-Euphrates valley and into Europe.

Kuweit derives its name from Kut, a walled village, and is the Arabic diminutive of that word. The place was formerly called Grane on some maps. It is one of the most important towns in the gulf, and has a population of perhaps 16,000, most of them belonging to the Al Uttab tribe. It is situated on the north side of a fine bay, which measures twenty miles east and west and ten miles broad, with water of ten fathoms and under, affording good anchorage. The town commences about a mile southwest of Ras al Ajuza (Old Woman's cape) and extends for over a mile along the shore. It was formerly surrounded by a wall with towers, which are now in a ruinous state. There is a large suburb of mat huts outside the walls. As the whole country round about is quite desert, the place is entirely dependent on its trade for support. It has more native shipping than any port in the gulf, although the pearl fisheries are not notably important. The town is remarkably cleanly, and has some very well built houses and an extensive dockyard for boatbuilding. Bedouin tribes from all along the gulf, as well as from Nejd, come here to market, bringing horses, cattle and sheep to exchange for dates, clothing, firearms and Manchester goods. Nearly always one can see a large encampment of Bedouins outside the town. The climate is drier and healthier than that of all the river towns and most of the ports in the gulf. The population of the town is steadily increasing and has grown rapidly, for an Oriental town, ever since its first settlement by Arabs about 1716. The bulk of the population are orthodox Sunni Moslems. Among them are a small number who belong to the strict sect of the Wahabis, and perhaps two score Jews who enjoy considerable influence and every liberty. They have a small synagogue.



One of the Black Tents of the Bedouins

The city began with a settlement of tents such as this

Future Importance Not Measured by Past History

The three main routes from Kuweit inland are to Hassa, to Hail in Nejd, and to Busrah. The route overland from Kuweit to Busrah goes across the desert until you reach an old canal. Following this, a second day's camel march brings you to Zobeir, a small village on the site of the ancient Busrah and only a few hours from its present site. At Zobeir is the tomb of the great Moslem leader from whom the town is named. From Kuweit to Hassa there are four routes; in each case it means from eight to ten days for a caravan. From Kuweit to Riadh it is twelve days, to Mecca twenty-six days.

The importance of Kuweit in the future is not to be measured by its past history. Beginning as a small fishing village 180 years ago, when a little band of Arabs settled in mat huts and tents like the one shown in the picture to gain a living by selling the fish with which the harbor swarms, Kuweit has now become a town of first importance and a bone of contention between the great political powers of the world, all anxious for commercial advantage.

Caravan Coming Into Kuweit from the Desert

The first sheik of Kuweit was called Sabah, the great grandfather of the present ruler. He was succeeded by his son Jabir, and he again by his son also called Sabah. The last named sheik had four sons, Abdullah, Mohammed, Gerah and Mobarrek, the latter the present ruler of Kuweit. It is a long and complicated story of Arab jealousy and Turkish intrigue, and some say, foreign interference, by which matters rose to such a pass that it was impossible for the four brothers to live together at Kuweit and peace to reign among the people. So for better or for worse, Mobarrek chose the time-honored custom of doing away with his rivals and retaining the reins of government in his own hands. This episode, except in Arab eyes, cannot be dignified as anything higher than murder.

It was before this time that the game of diplomacy began for the possession of Kuweit in connection with the concession to the Germans on the part of Turkey for the overland railway to Bagdad and beyond. Early in 1900 a German mission arrived overland at Kuweit, headed by a German consular agent at Constantinople, Herr Stemrich. The object of his visit was to secure a concession for the terminus of the Bagdad railway, but Mobarrek, being then on bad terms with the Turks, and knowing their relations with the German government, flatly refused. A year previous the British resident in the Persian gulf had made an agreement with the sheik precluding the cession of any portion of his territory to any foreign power. In other words, the English had checkmated the German game before they were ready to make their move. No outsider knows the precise terms of this agreement, said to date January 23, 1899, but they were referred to by Mr. Balfour in the house of commons in such words as to leave no doubt of their import. He said: "Kuweit and its surrounding country are the territory of a sheik whom we have under our protection, and with whom we have special treaties"; while Lord Curzon has stated that "the agreement of the Indian government with the sheik of Kuweit was tantamount to an assertion of a protectorate."

Rival Claims of Turkey and Great Britain

During the time of Lord Curzon's visit to the Persian gulf, when he was viceroy of India, Turkey repeatedly tried to obtain possession of Kuweit, over which she has always claimed a sort of suzerainty. From The London Times we learn:

"Reams have been written about the basis of the Turkish claims to Kuweit. The very origin of the Arabs of Kuweit is disputed. Colonel Pelly, a former resident in the Persian gulf, declared that they came from Um Kasr 250 years ago, but the Bombay government records and the memoirs of Midhat Pasha alike state that they came from Nedjd, and the latter theory is probably correct. The statements in the Bombay records about their relations with the Turks are rather contradictory. It is fairly clear that throughout the eighteenth century the sheiks of Kuweit were entirely independent. In 1829 Captain Brucks of the Indian navy wrote that the sheik 'acknowledged the authority of the porte' and paid annual tribute. In 1845 Lieutenant Kemball reported that for twenty years Kuweit had been considered to be 'closely connected' with the pashalik of Bagdad. The Kuweit vessels flew the Turkish flag and the sheik received annually 200 karahs of dates, in return for which he was bound to protect Basra from foreign aggression. There is not much suggestion of suzerainty or tribute in this."

Into this controversy between Great Britain and Turkey as to prior claims on Kuweit it is not necessary to enter. Great Britain's right in the Persian gulf need not be based on any such flimsy pretext as an annual tribute of bags of rice and dates, nor is the supremacy of England in the gulf and at Kuweit due to gunboats and gunpowder. It is most of all by the arts of peace that she has established and glorified her power on the Arabian coasts, including Kuweit. It must never be forgotten that the survey of this entire region and the discovery, if we may so express it, of the fact that Kuweit was the best harbor in the gulf are due to British and Indian naval officers. By means of this coast survey, completed at great cost of money and life, commerce has been aided and navigation made possible. The only postal system in the gulf that is trustworthy is the Indian post, and the regular mail service of the gulf is a British institution. England has also earned her supremacy in Arabian waters by stopping the slave trade and piracy. More than this, she has preserved the peace and made commercial progress possible. It would be perfectly correct to say that without Great Britain in the gulf Kuweit would still be a fishing village subject to depredation and attack from every other fishing village.

THE WAYFARER

On the Ragged Edge of War

ACCENT THE "RAGGED," please. Down here in Juarez (pronounced "war-es"), where the victorious rebels under General Villa (pronounced "Via") have their headquarters, one gets a good view of the ingloriousness of war. The town is pockmarked with destroyed buildings. Adobe houses have burnt down, fallen down or been knocked down. If there was seemliness or symmetry about this city named for the great patriot whose monument is its one attempt at artistic excellence, it has disappeared under the blight of war. Business is utterly dead. A great lassitude envelops the town. The peon in a huge hat, leaning against a post and wrapped in contemplation and a frowzy blanket, typifies the city today.

From the familiar mud bricks to the furtive natives squatting about doorways there was much in Mexico to remind the Wayfarer of Asia, and especially of Turkey. The same love of garish colors, the same somber-clad women (although here unveiled), the same open-air merchandising, the same delight in display of bandoliers of cartridges by the soldiers. If one is fortunate enough to be in El Paso he may "see Mexico" for a 10-cent street car ride and be assured that thenceforth a Turkish village would not seem strange to him.

* * * * * * *

Gambling is wide open and licensed in Juarez, but even this business is poor. Accompanied by an El Paso pastor, the Wayfarer one day started in to inspect the various forms of gambling. As we drew near a "capper," or outside man, seized upon the minister and wanted to introduce him to the game. He grew quite familiar with Mr. Preacher, calling him "Cop" and "Dutch," and showing serene confidence that he had him hooked as a victim. He paid no attention to the Wayfarer—whether because the latter looks too worldly wise or too pious or too poor to gamble, is a moot point between the preacher and the Wayfarer. Of course, the games were crooked; to even an inexpert eye this was clear. The crudity and inefficiency of the way the business was run made the Wayfarer marvel, for the gambler is supposed to be a clever fellow. But not in Mexico. Near by was the bull ring, where the visitor saw the four bulls and the poor wrecks of horses that were to be sacrificed on the following Sunday.

Blood does not affect the Mexican's nerves. On a later day the Wayfarer had gone over to inspect the town of Juarez during the actual progress of a battle. There was little to see except a few wounded and the crowds listening to the firing. One boy of 17 or thereabouts, with a veil of blood over his face, was sheepishly displaying a bullet path plowed through his scalp. Half an inch deeper and the boy would have been lying on the field of the dead. Minor wounds were neglected. The hospital facilities in Juarez were practically nonexistent, and El Paso was appealed to for doctors.

All that Juarez is not El Paso is. A well-ordered, well-built, well-paved, prosperous American city, this metropolis of the southwest shines brighter by contrast with its neighbor across the dusty Rio Grande. The skyscrapers seem higher, the hotels more magnificent, the churches more beautiful and the homes more palatial because the observer cannot help comparing them with what he has seen across the river bed. Of course, most of Juarez has refugeed to El Paso. The poor people have congregated in many acres of adobe huts down by the border and during the battle they were bunched by the hundreds on the high places, looking over toward the hills, whence came the sounds of the fighting.

* * * * * * *

A dapper young man with curled mustache, fancy vest (unbuttoned), a soft shirt that had valiantly refused to surrender to the laundry and, over all, a sort of khaki uniform, proved to be the commanding officer in charge of Juarez. Promoted from the office of the El Paso Gas Company to be a colonel in the Constitutional army, Senor Juan N. Medina looked his former part more than the latter. Gracious, hospitable and charming, he apologized to the Wayfarer that he had not a home to place at his disposal. But such as he had—indicating with a deprecatory shrug the crowded office, stored with flour—he freely offered the visitor. Ingenuously delighted with his luck, he told how he had been in eight battles with never a wound. He had heard that a general's commission was on the way to him, but he did not talk about that. Congratulated upon the good order observed by the soldiers, he briefly remarked—all the time talking, of course, with hands and shoulders and flashing black eyes—that the men knew that to loot meant to be shot. He had executed eight men for this offense. The bloody reality of war was hard to associate with this genial young gentleman; yet even as we spoke the battle raged only eleven miles away.

* * * * * * *

Discipline is rough and ready in the rebel army. One could distinguish soldiers from other ragged peons usually only by the cartridge belts. There had been a distribution of blankets also and these were worn Indian fashion. The trig, clean, well-set-up American soldiers on the opposite side of the bridge were in rather overwhelming contrast to these Mexican recruits. The station guard, for instance, consisted of fortunate ones who could pile their possessions around them—said possessions ranging from a guitar to a new pair of shoes or a coffee pot—and doze away the day, the women bringing them food prepared on the spot. Some soldiers seemed to have their wives and household goods with them, the goods consisting of innumerable cloth bundles. One boy of certainly not more than 12 was soldiering with his father, his cartridge belt as full and fierce as anybody's By the way, during that battle of Juarez General Villa was bothered by half a dozen runaway American boys who had followed him to see the fighting. He considerately took time to notify the American consul of their presence. Being consul on the border these days, especially when one must represent nearly all other nations as well as his own, is not the easiest position in the government service. Each foreigner flies his own flag above his home.

* * * * * * *

The most cheerful man the Wayfarer found in Juarez except Colonel Medina was a Scotch-American from Seattle, who had been following the rebel forces taking tintypes of the soldiers and of the senoritas. Your Mexican warrior is rather vain and, like all simple people, fond of seeing his own "counterfeit presentment." Our jovial American was undisturbed by the cannonading; amid the crisis of war he found soldiers ready to pay 20 cents, Mexican, for a tintype. Business had been very good with him and he looked forward to an early return to Seattle. The newspaper photographer gets into the gallery of publicity, but this humble vendor of vanity had undergone experiences such as no correspondent had endured.

* * * * * * *

Sordid, unbeautiful and miserable as the war appears at close range, the Wayfarer saw one romantic touch at the railroad station, where the wounded were being brought in trains from the battlefields. This was the long row of women, their features half covered by black mantillas, sitting crouched on the edge of the brick platform, their faces turned toward the smoky hills. Not wild-eyed fear or anxiety was written on their countenances, but dull, stolid, and, oh! so weary waiting. They were fulfilling woman's old, old mission of waiting at home for news of their men afield in action. Their talk was not of national issues; to each of them the result of the battle then raging would be determined only by whether or not their own man returned safe. From the woman's viewpoint war is a monster, and nothing but a monster.

THE WAYFARER.

How Anne Got a Hearing

BY HARRIET LUMMIS SMITH

AS ANNE LAY in the little iron bed, grimly immaculate with its spotless coverings, she seemed to herself part of a geometrical figure. There were similar beds to the right and to the left, above and below. Despite her efforts to throw off the obsession, her fancy wove them into complicated patterns, connecting them now by straight lines and again by curves. Something of fantasy of delirium still held her in its grip and made her a part of the elaborate design, changing with kaleidoscopic rapidity into new combinations. She told herself fretfully that she could not feel sure that she was really gaining till her bed ceased to be the center from which radiated imaginary lines, combining the beds in the ward into a symmetrical whole.

The fascination of weaving these spidery webs might not have been so great had Anne dared to trust herself to think either of her immediate past or of her future. As soon as she became stronger she must face the question of what she was to do when she left the hospital. At present such a consideration would seriously retard her convalescence. And the nightmare of those months after she came to the city was something she would never remember except against her will. But though she fought with all the strength she could muster against these memories, there were times when recollection overwhelmed her like a breaking wave and left her drenched and shaken.

THE PATHETIC part of it was that she had left her country home with such high hopes, fearless, sure of herself. From the time she was a little girl she had been accustomed to evoke enthusiasm by her unusual voice. Chance had given her a teacher whom the city conservatories could hardly have improved upon, a broken-down musician whose voice suggested as little of its old-time richness as her face had retained of youthful beauty, but who nevertheless was mistress of the science of her art. Like many another teacher, she had a profound and disinterested faith in her pupil's future. She transferred to Anne the ambition under which a finis had been written. In fancy she saw the successes of her past repeated in the girl's future. She was an enthusiast by nature, and enthusiasts, though inspiring companions, are not always wise advisers.

When she died she bequeathed to her pupil the remnant of her little store of savings, amounting to $300, along with a legacy of hope and ambition whose value was not so easily computed. And forthwith Anne had packed her trunk, received the good wishes and congratulations of her little world and started out to conquer. She had all the emotions of a millionaire, young, strong, unafraid, endowed with a beautiful voice—and with $300 in her pocket, she seemed to herself almost surfeited with riches.

Within twenty-four hours the disillusion had begun. The country girl had known nothing of the meaning of competition. In half a dozen towns hers had been the leading voice. She was accustomed to excelling. But here no one had time or wish to allow her to prove her claims. Her modest advertisement in the daily papers, asking for pupils, was ignored. There were plenty of teachers with conservatory diplomas and the prestige of foreign study. All the churches were supplied with singers. Those who were not in too much of a hurry to give her counsel suggested that she should go to New York and secure employment in the chorus of some musical comedy. This advice she found harder to bear than the rebuffs with which she was so rapidly becoming familiar.

SHE WAS still hopeful when she woke up to the realization that her money was melting rapidly. She had gone to a good boarding house, recommended by acquaintances who preferred it to a hotel because of its quiet and lack of formality. She assumed that it was necessary for her to have a room with a piano in order to keep up her practice and though the cost had taken her breath at first, she had quickly recovered herself. After all, what did the little initial expense matter, when she was so soon to be earning?

After the first six months she changed boarding places rapidly. Then she got a room and cooked her meals over a gas jet. By now, despite her pride, the thought of going home presented unutterable allurement, but she had no home to which to go, for when Anne had left for the city her mother had broken up housekeeping, sold and distributed her furniture and then gone to a married daughter in the West. Julia's home was pleasant but a little crowded. Anne's mother shared a bedroom with two of her grandchildren, and the arrival of a guest to spend the night meant a turning out and overturning comparable to the effect of an earthquake. There was no place for Anne to go. There was nothing for her to do but to continue an endeavor which had become hopeless.

When the lodging-house keeper had heard her moaning faintly one forenoon she turned the knob and entered without waiting to knock. The bare little room, though it combined the functions of bedroom, dining room and kitchen, was scrupulously neat. Anne had elaborated a corner cupboard out of a packing box and 10 cents' worth of cretonne, which concealed her meager store of dishes and cooking utensils, and contrasted with the chocolate-colored wall paper, was rather ornamental than otherwise. The lodging-house keeper, accustomed to the unutterable disorder of the under-bred, to clothing heaped in the middle of the floor, to the soiled dishes of perhaps more than one meal in unpleasant proximity to toilet articles, looked about her and respected her lodger. And that respect may in part have accounted for her kindness. She brought Anne a glass of cold water, bathed her flushed face and encouraged her to make light of her attack. "You've taken cold, that's all. One of those all-overish colds that make a body feel mean enough to die."

It was 6 o'clock when the busy woman again got around to the third-story room. Then something in the girl's appearance startled her, and she sent a slatternly maid post haste for the nearest doctor. Shortly after dark an ambulance stopped before the lodging house door and a closely wrapped figure was borne out. By this time Anne was too sick either to wonder what would happen to her, or to care.

WITH the characteristic thoughtlessness of childhood, Anne had neglected to have the scarlet fever at the proper time. By way of atonement for her neglect she had an exceptionally severe attack. For ten days she was delirious and then followed a period of pallid weakness when the effort of drawing the breath of life seemed almost beyond her strength. There was no one to worry. She had written her mother the day before she was taken sick, and though by this time Mrs. Barrows was complaining every time the special delivery wagon drove past that Anne was getting careless about her letters, it did not occur to her to become seriously alarmed. For a number of months Anne's letters had been growing more and more infrequent, as there were more things in her life to conceal.

And so Anne fought her battle, unaided by the strength of loving watchers, untroubled by any hint of anxiety in the eyes that looked on. And then she began to get better and finally to gain rapidly, mute testimony to the innate vigor of her constitution. And the doctors looked down at her with the satisfaction of workmen who have done a good job, and the nurses treated her with their impersonal, professional kindness, and from being merely a sufferer Anne began to feel herself again a human being. If only she could have freed herself from the impression of the necessity of constantly constructing geometrical figures with the beds of the ward as determining points she would have been quite sure of her personality.

THE DAY came when she found herself unable to refuse to take a peep ahead. What was she going to do? What was she going to do? The curtain went up, but the stage was blank. There was no opening in the city for a singer trained in the country. No one would give her a hearing. She wondered humbly if she could obtain employment in some department store. Nothing was left of the jaunty confidence with which she had gone forth to conquer. She was fitted to do only one thing and nobody wanted her services. Weakened in mind as well as in body, she doubted her ability to support herself. The world seemed full of busy people, all with something to do. She alone was useless.

It was not strange that she slept restlessly, facing in her dreams the problem that possessed her conscious moments, but presented in concrete form. Again and again she started awake, trembling over some fantasy of the brain so vivid as to seem real. And when once she woke to see a flicker on the ceiling overhead she counted it in with her other delusions, and lay looking with apathy at the curious interplay of light and shadow. Then suddenly her dreams fell from her like a cloak. She started up, breaking the hush of the sleeping ward by speaking aloud—"What's that?"

The flickering light upon the ceiling was not a fancy. It was a reality, strange and ominous. Anne raised herself with difficulty, knelt at the foot of her bed and leaned far forward for a look out the window. What she saw explained only too completely.

She was out of her bed in a moment, running in her stockingless feet over the bare floor, staggering as she ran, for it was long since her feet had borne her weight. The nurse on duty, sitting upright in her chair, had been indulging in "forty winks" which had been multiplied many times beyond that limit, but she started into instant wakefulness as Anne clutched her arm. "What are you doing out of bed?" she demanded sternly.

"Something's on fire—the stable, I guess." The nurse went down the corridor with flying feet and Anne beat a retreat to bed at a very moderate pace. All at once her ankles seemed brittle like glass and her feet of extraordinary weight and the sight of the little plain hospital bed was as grateful as anything she could think of in the world except her mother's face.

IN A few minutes everyone in the ward was awake. The hospital, being used only for contagious diseases, was in an isolated section. There were but few men employed and only two of them besides the superintendent slept on the premises. Until the fire department could arrive from town it was necessary for the nurses to turn in and fight the fire. The nurse to whom Anne had carried the warning had roused first the superintendent and then her colleagues. Hurrying feet resounded through the corridors of the building, excited voices were calling. Patients woke up, stared, asked questions, grew frightened.

The outbreak of the panic was as startlingly sudden as a lightning flash. A child, convalescent from scarlet fever, craned her neck to admire the flames enveloping the near-by outbuildings; then, suddenly recalling an almost forgotten item of knowledge that fires sometimes burned people, she began to scream. In fifteen seconds her shrieks were being echoed from a dozen directions. Women grew hysterical. Little girls, beside themselves with fright, leaped out of bed and ran about with glaring, frightened eyes.

Then all at once pandemonium reigned. Sobs, shrieks, cries, prayers blended in an intolerable confusion of sound. A little girl just over the crisis of a fever ran past her, falling from weakness every few steps, then picking herself up and stumbling blindly on. A woman in the bed next to Anne's began to laugh hysterically, her meaningless laughter adding to the horror of the scene.

The nurses had formed a bucket brigade and were fighting desperately to keep the flames from attacking the hospital. The men had their hands full leading the frenzied horses from the burning stable. One nurse, the youngest of the force, came into the ward and attempted to restore order. She might as well have braced her puny strength against an incoming tidal wave.

ALL AT once a sweet, soaring, joyous voice filled the room. Above the terrified clamor rose the strains of a popular melody, scoffingly designated by the cultured as "rag-time," but with a lilt and swing that caught the imagination and led the memory captive. Everybody knew it. Everybody had hummed it at one time or another. And as the dominating voice rose the medley of shrieks and outcries grew faint, almost died away.

Her eyes fixed on the ceiling, all her reviving energy concentrated in her voice, Anne sang on, emphasizing the rhythm of the melody in the fashion which leads the listener on irresistibly to beat time. The nurse, clutching at the wild hope like a drowning man at a straw, chimed in. She was not much of a singer, but she made herself heard. One of the children, less frightened than the others, was caught by the wave and joined her piping notes to the other voices. By the second verse half a dozen were singing.

The panic was conquered. For with a panic, as with a mob, everything depends on not giving it too much of a start. Five minutes later the entire hospital force would have been unequal to maintaining order. The dominant swing of the rag-time had come just in time. And before the magic of the first selection had time to pall Anne had chosen another.

Outside they were fighting desperately. Men were on the roof, pouring buckets of water on the dry shingles, where sparks from the burning building fell like flakes of gold. The nurses, half dressed, passed buckets from hand to hand, calling on one another to hurry. They had listened to the shrieks from the hospital with tense, set faces and then all at once a wave of music had beaten on their bewildered ears, a splendid voice soaring above the rest. "God bless her, whoever she is," said the head nurse.

FROM THE distance came the sound of clanging gongs. The fire department was at hand. And as the heroes who wore the rubber uniforms climbed from their seats a lusty chorus rushed out to greet them. Everybody, even the hysterical woman, was singing now:

"Has anybody here seen Kelly—
Kelly from the Emerald Isle?"

The gallant little band of amateur fire fighters had not been able to extinguish the flames, but they had kept them in check. The stable was beyond help, but the hospital was saved. Soon the big streams of water were dominating the audacious flames and the exhausted nurses went indoors, looking at one another with pale, incredulous faces as they began to realize that the scene through which they had just passed was actual, not a fantasy of dreams.

"How are we going to quiet them down?" the head nurse asked a little later as she stood by Anne's bed. The stable was a heap of ruins, the engine had gone lurching away behind the horses, who trotted off sedately, well appreciating the difference between the speed required for going to a fire and that suitable for the return. The hospital chorus was not as lusty as it had been. A good many voices had dropped out altogether. Others were hoarse and broke frequently. One, flutelike and sweet, sang on tirelessly. "How shall we quiet them?" the head nurse repeated, looking around upon the excited faces.

"I can manage it, I think." Anne had just come to the end of a popular favorite and she waited a moment to get her breath. When she started on the next song no voices joined with her, but every ear was alert. She sang a lullaby, new to her audience, exquisitely sweet and soothing. By the second verse tense little faces were losing their look of strained excitement. A small girl down at the end of the ward yawned audibly. Another rubbed her eyes.

The nurses were going from one to another, speaking with low, authoritative voices. Small forms straightened themselves. The lids drooped over tired eyes. The lullaby grew softer, died away in a tender, sustained note. And then Anne looked up to see the hospital superintendent standing beside her.

He was a grimy superintendent, his blackened face scarcely recognizable, but under the streaks and smudge shone a look which warmed Anne's heart.

"We are under untold obligations to you," said the superintendent. He was hoarse from shouting, but his voice fell like music on Anne's ears. "Few people would have been equal to such an emergency, leaving the beautiful voice out of consideration. You are a professional singer, I suppose."

It took about twenty words to explain the situation. "I see," said the superintendent, wrinkling his brow. "I think that can all be arranged. But don't think about it just now. You need a rest."

AND SO Anne got her hearing at last. The superintendent was a man of influence. Nurses and patients told the story of the night of the fire so many times that on her recovery Anne was rather startled to find herself forced into the role of a popular heroine. And it seemed that, after all, one of the big churches wanted a soprano and that there was a chance for music teachers who were not conservatory graduates.

Anne has learned to smile at the memory of her early ambitious dream and even those days of disappointment and struggle have lost their terror and serve as a rather pleasing background for her present success. For if hard work which is a pleasure in the doing, and gives satisfaction to those for whom it is done, is not success, it is at least a satisfactory substitute. Sometimes when she faces an audience and notes the pleased expectancy of the eyes upraised to hers she suddenly finds herself remembering the smoke-filled hospital ward and the light upon the ceiling and the frantic children running to and fro. That she has a hearing now is due to the fact that she claimed a hearing then. As often in this life of ours, unselfish courage opened the door into opportunity.

His Help Was Appreciated

A popular doctor was much pleased with a certain aerated water, and by his assiduous recommendations helped to get it a celebrity it justly deserved. The doctor acted solely in the interests of humanity generally, and expected no return.

To his surprise there came one morning an effusive letter from the company, saying that his recommendations had done them so much good that they "ventured to send him a hundred——"

Here the page came to an end.

"This will never do," said the doctor; "it is very kind, but I could not think of accepting anything."

Then he turned the page and found the sentence ran: "—of our circulars for distribution."

Where the New Jokes Come From

"This seems to be a new joke," ejaculated the editor.

"It is," replied the contributor. "I translated it from the Nippur tablets."—Philadelphia Ledger.

Punishment as a Factor in Training Your Child

WHEN your Janey is obstinate and says "I won't," and Johnnie seems bent on destroying everything he can lay his hands on, do you sigh resignedly and say, "Oh, well, they're just like the average child, I suppose. All children do these things occasionally"? If you do, you are radically wrong in your deductions and conclusions. In the first place, there is no such thing as an "average" child. Every child has his own individual instincts, interests and temperament. In the second place, though all children may do these things occasionally, as you say, no two children act on the same motive in doing them. The directing impulse differs in each.

Since there is no average child, it naturally follows that there can be no cut and dried rule of training and conduct which can be applied to all children alike. It has been an all too common error of parents to lay down some ironclad law and expect all the children of the family, regardless of fundamental differences, to obey it, and in exactly the same way. This has been by no means due to lack of parental love; it has come about largely through ignorance of the fact that each child is a small world unto himself and must be discovered and explored accordingly; that it is the duty of every father and mother to know the nature of their own child in order that they may assist in the development of all his possibilities. For the problem of each child is an individual one. Careful study of the child makes possible a closer intimacy with him and a continuance of that intimacy into his more mature youth.

Available Material on Child Training Makes Ignorance Inexcusable

Parental ignorance of this sort, however, cannot long be excused. Though there can be no universal formula for the bringing up of children, there are certain general laws of child development and certain general principles of child training which have been derived from scientific studies of children. These general laws and principles should be learned and applied in conjunction with the natural intuition and common sense of parents, in the bringing up of the rising generation. They may be obtained from various sources. Opportunity for study of child training based on scientific principle has recently been presented quite simply and understandably in a book on "Your Child Today and Tomorrow," by Sidonie Matzner Gruenberg, published by the J. B. Lippincott Company, Philadelphia. Mrs. Gruenberg embodies in her work the ideas of many master minds in the realm of child study and so speaks with the authority which results not only from study and practical experience but from knowledge derived from association with specialists.

One of the most serious problems which confront conscientious parents is the wise administration of punishment. To this problem, among several others equally vital which she discusses, Mrs. Gruenberg devotes an entire chapter, first expressing some astonishment in the great interest mothers take in the uses of punishment, and the kind of punishment. "I have frequently felt," she declares, "as if the only contact some mothers have with their children is to punish them, and that punishment constituted the chief part of the poor children's training. Now, punishment," she continues, "undoubtedly has a place in the training of children, but only a negative place. The proper punishment, administered in the right spirit, may cure or correct a fault, but punishment does not make children good. If children are punished frequently it may even make them bad. We can all remember some of the punishments of our own childhood. How unjust they seemed then and do now, after all these years to heal the wounds! How outraged we felt! Into how unloving a mood they put us! . . . Gradually we have come to recognize that the only legitimate purpose of punishment in the treatment of offenders is to redeem their characters, to make them positively better, not merely frighten them into a state of apparent right-doing—that is, a state of avoiding wrongdoing."

Mrs. Gruenberg declares that we have a very primitive way of looking at wrong-doing and punishment, and that far too often we allow ourselves to be mastered by the animal instinct to strike back. When the child does something that causes annoyance or even damage, we do not stop to consider his motive, we only respond to the result of his action. Instead of having a studied policy for treating his offense we slide back to the instinct to "pay him" for what he has done.

This brings us to the old rule: Never punish in anger. On the other hand, while we must allow every trace of anger to disappear, we must not allow so much time to elapse as to make the child lose the connection between his act and the consequence.

In regard to methods of punishment, the author believes that nothing that is considered desirable or beneficial should be brought into disfavor. For instance, sending a child to bed, or keeping him after school. Further, no punishment should ever deprive a child of conditions that are necessary for his health or impose conditions that are harmful. Also, it is not wise to exaggerate the importance of trivial acts by treating them too seriously.

> We must never disbelieve in life, even though in sickness and sorrow and age it may seem to ebb from us; and we must try at all costs to recognize it, to sympathize with it, to put ourselves in touch with it, even though it takes forms unintelligible and even repugnant to ourselves.—A. C. Benson.

Parents often err in condemning a child after he has committed a wrong deed instead of condemning the deed itself. Such a course may merely help to fix upon him the habit of committing similar deeds in the future.

Scolding as a punishment is not efficacious. It is likely to degenerate into nagging and to arouse contempt in the offender. Even reasoning often fails to accomplish its purpose because the child's reasoning is so different from that of an adult. Only the parent able to understand the workings of his child's mind can hope to make this method work satisfactorily in correcting faults and establishing good habits and ideals.

As for corporal punishment, Mrs. Gruenberg considers it in most cases not only unnecessary, but positively harmful. "Children that are treated like animals will behave like animals."

It becomes plain, then, from the author's treatment of the subject, that "it is impossible to recommend any punishment as the correct one, or even to recommend any one infallible rule. But there are certain definite principles which we must keep in mind and which will do much toward making our task of discipline more rational: "We must never punish in anger. We must consider the motive and the temptation before the consequence of the deed. We must condemn the deed and not the child. We must be sure the child understands exactly the offense with which he is charged. We must be sure that he sees the relation of the offense to the punishment. We must never administer any excessive or unusual punishment. We must not exaggerate the magnitude of the offense.

"In a family where the proper spirit of intimacy reigns, punishment will be relegated to its proper place—namely, the medicine closet—and not be used as daily bread. For punishment is a medicine—a corrective—and when we administer it, we must do so in the spirit of the physician."

When all is said and done, "love and patience are the secret of child management. Love which can force a response from the chilliest soul; patience which knows how to wait for the harvest."

Agent Makes Involuntary Prosposal

On the old Rosebud Indian reservation in South Dakota they still laugh over the peculiar predicament into which a new Indian agent once got himself. The Youth's Companion tells about it thus:

The agent, an unqualified "tenderfoot," was inspecting an Indian school. Noticing that as soon as he entered the room every girl present brought her hair forward over her face, he asked the teacher to tell them to throw it back so that he might see their faces. But this they refused to do, until, after much urging, one girl did finally uncover her face.

After school was over the agent wondered at the strange actions of the girl who had showed him her face. She followed him to his house, entered after him, and set about getting his dinner. As he spoke no Sioux, and she no English, he could get no explanation from her.

Finally to his relief the teacher rode up. Shaking with laughter he asked the agent how he liked his new wife! Then the latter understood what he had done. In certain tribes of the Sioux Indians all a man needs to do in order to get a wife is to induce a girl to uncover her face. The agent had proposed in the usual way—and been accepted. It cost him the equivalent of fourteen ponies to persuade the Indian girl's father to take her back again.

Verses Old and New

THE MOTHER

And now, they did not need her any more.
She heard below the shudder of the door,
The quick feet on the path, and she was fain
Only to snatch her sewing up again,
And sew, and sew, seam over feverish seam,
Hurrying in the dumb haze of a dream,
Thrusting away the moment when her hand
Should force her idleness to understand
That they were gone, all gone, and at the door
They would not call and claim her any more.

Young as the morning, they were gone away,
Whose kisses kept her hair from turning gray,
Whose laughter kept her ready. Wherefore now
Should not those wrinkles deepen in her brow,
And she shut up her heart, and learn to be
Of her bright self a queer, dull travesty?

And yet, the smile they left her must not die;
For crying now, might she not always cry?
"O God!" she whispered, sewing, "keep me! O,
Thou only, over all the world, must know!"

Clark's Crow Makes Its Final Appearance

Dear Editor Home Council: My state of mind when I read Miss Baker's comment on the scarlet tanager that supplied the red for the bird flag in my "Red, White and Blue Day" you can perhaps imagine. What appeared to my eastern, city-bred eyes to be a scarlet tanager must have been — something else. Not being a bird expert, I added him to the flag for the sake of the color.

And now, because of the delightfully full and interesting answers of your readers to Mr. Barbour's inquiry, I know lots more about Clark's crow than I did when the little story was written, so I am not sorry after all that I blundered. My children have promised to buy me a book on "How to Tell the Birds from the Flowers"!

The Gifts of the Christmas Angels

BY SARAH CORY RIPPEY

THE WIND that howled down the chimney of the house in which Angela lived, and rattled the doors and windows, whirled the snow in clouds against the icy panes and piled it up in heaps outside.

"Woo-o-o-o!" it raged at the doorway as Angela's mother slipped in; and "Woo-o-o-o!" it raged disappointedly as she shut the door in its face and stamped her feet free of snow.

"Woo-o-o-o!" echoed Angela's mother, taking off her wet shawl and hanging it over the clothes bars to dry; "I'm cold through and through. It's going to be a bad night, and hard for poor folks."

"But it's good for Santa Claus, mamma," cried Angela, running to get her evening kiss; "the girls all said so—on account of his sleigh, you know. He was at the nursery last night. See what he left there for me!" And Angela pointed an eager little finger toward some toys on the floor and an empty doll's cradle. "They gave the things to me today after school. He didn't bring the dolly," she added wistfully, "but p'raps he'll bring it tonight."

Angela's mother glanced down at the white-painted cradle. In it lay a towel pinned and patted and tied into something that might be a doll if you only thought about it that way. Then her eyes followed Angela's quick look toward the fireplace. There hung a tiny stocking all ready for Santa's filling.

"Santa may be too tired to come again, dear," she said slowly; "or," she added hastily as Angela's lip began to quiver, "perhaps Mrs. Santa won't let him bring a dolly out in the storm. It might catch cold, you know."

"Oh, no, it never could," contradicted Angela quickly; "it couldn't catch cold! You see, he'd wrap it in his fur coat! And Santa never gets tired. He goes all round the world. He couldn't do that if he got tired."

Angela's mother didn't answer. She was grown up, and she thought she knew many things Angela did not. One of those things she thought she knew was that Santa Claus did get tired sometimes—too tired, she felt sure, to come to a house where there lived a little girl whose mother worked hard all day to get money for food and a bit of fire.

The little stocking stirred joyously in the fireplace as Angela's mother kindled that bit of fire and warmed the soup over the coals. The little stocking did not believe that Santa Claus ever got tired. Neither did Angela believe it. Only Angela's mother believed it. That was because she was grown up and thought she knew.

"Now tell me about Christmas in the mountains before we were poor," begged Angela when supper was over, and she had curled up in her mother's lap before the fire.

"Well, when we lived in——"

"No, that's not the way," interrupted Angela. "Begin, 'Once upon a time.' "

"Once upon a time," her mother began again, "when your daddy and I lived out in the mountains——"

"The high, high mountains," corrected Angela.

"The high, high mountains, we were very lonely, because we lived so many miles from our neighbors and because we had——"

"No little girl," broke in Angela eagerly.

"And because we had no little girl. We had cows and pigs and chickens——"

"And old Jack," put in Angela.

"And old Jack, the horse, and we loved them all very much. But not half so much, we knew, as we should love a little girl. Well——"

"Hurry up to Christmas, mamma!" cried Angela impatiently.

"Well, one Christmas eve, when the wind was howling 'Woo-o-o-o!' just as it's doing tonight, and blowing the snow against the windows we pulled our chairs up to the fire, daddy——"

" 'N' grandma!"

"And grandma and I. And we talked about Christmas——"

" 'N' you all wished Santa 'd bring you a baby girl."

"And we all wished Santa would bring us a baby girl."

" 'N' he did!" cried Angela, sitting straight up in her eagerness. "He brought me! 'N' you named me Angela!"

Rhymes to Remember

ZOOLOGICAL TOMMY

When Tommy's good, I often hear
His mamma call him little DEER.
But when he has a cold, of course,
He sometimes is a little HORSE!
And oftentimes quite sure I am
He is a precious little LAMB.
While then, again without excuse,
He proves to be a silly GOOSE.
Alas! it grieves me this to tell,
But I have sometimes seen quite well
Greedy Tom, with mouthful big,
Turn into a little PIG!

MISSIONARY WORK

An American College Ceremony in India

Fourteen years ago at a meeting of the North India mission of the Presbyterian Church, U. S. A., Rev. C. A. R. Janvier, then of Allahabad, proposed that the mission apply to the board in New York for sanction to found a college there. Sanction was granted and Arthur Ewing was sent to be principal of the new college. He arrived in March, 1901, and Dr. Janvier left for America within a few days. For eleven years Arthur Ewing labored and built from nothing one of the largest first grade colleges in Allahabad University, making it an intellectual and spiritual center whose influence is being felt throughout North India. The strain of it cost his life, and since September, 1912, what was Allahabad Christian College has been known as "Ewing Christian College" in honor of the leader who had given himself for it.

When the mission took up in sorrow the great need of the college, the thoughts of all turned naturally to the man who had led in founding it and who, though burdened with heavy pastoral responsibilities in America, had loyally stood behind it to raise the funds and secure the men that Arthur Ewing needed. He was summoned by cable by the mission and in that message he heard an answer to his prayer that it might be clearly shown to him whether or not he should return to India. A year of strenuous work to assure some permanent support for the college in America followed and leaving his pastorate in Hollond Memorial church, Philadelphia, he sailed for India in October, as told by The Continent last week.

A busy month was spent in making himself familiar with the routine of the college; then came his inauguration. Nov. 13 was "a big day" in Allahabad, for the inauguration of a college principal is no ordinary event, especially a real American inauguration with an "academic procession." The director of public instruction of the united provinces, an old friend, acted as chairman of the exercises. Dr. J. J. Lucas, veteran missionary of Allahabad station with forty-two years of active service behind him, president of the college's board of directors, impressively pronounced Dr. Janvier principal. If that audience of Hindu and Mohammedan students and graduates and English civilians needed to know the aim of a Christian college they had opportunity to hear it in the powerful words of Dr. Lucas. Professor Prabhu Das, who was with Dr. Ewing in the early days and who has been faithful to the college through its trials although offered better positions, spoke on behalf of the staff. He took advantage of the presence of a prominent British official in the chair to declare that the college was not making literary dummies; neither was it manufacturing anarchists and bomb throwers, but men loyal to the British crown and loyal citizens of their mother land. Talk about exchange professors! The presence in our church colleges in America of some of the intellectual leaders in non-Christian countries who have taken Christ at awful odds and have remained true to him in the face of every opposition would give American Christian students a sense of the preciousness of Christ that could not but profoundly affect their lives.

Dr. Janvier's address in accepting the principalship on "Thinking Through to God" was masterly. As the exercises closed there was a profound sense of thanksgiving for the leadership that had been so wonderfully provided by God in the past and in the years of consolidation and intensification that are to come.

Strong Doctor Wanted in Hard Place

The Continent recently in describing the proposed advance of Presbyterian missionary activity in Alaska alluded to the necessity of finding another man to take up the work at Point Barrow, the northernmost point where religious service is held anywhere on the continent. This need is so urgent that Dr. S. Hall Young, the Home Board's special representative for Alaska, has issued a further statement. In order to give the call all possible force, The Continent reprints Dr. Young's appeal. Anyone willing to consider the proposal should address Dr. Young at 156 5th avenue, New York City, at once.

Dr. Young says: "The conditions of life there are so hard that it has been difficult to procure a missionary physician for our large and important Eskimo churches at Point Barrow. The missionary must expect to be cut off during the greater part of the year from all communication with his friends. Formerly our Arctic missionaries had one mail a year; now they are favored with a winter mail as well as a summer one.

"We have comfortable buildings and the Christian work is well along. There are two Eskimo Presbyterian churches some distance apart, both to be ministered to by the same minister. Rev. S. R. Spriggs and Rev. Horatio Marsh, M. D., lived and worked successfully at Point Barrow until the needs of their families necessitated their return to the states.

"Rev. Mr. Cram of the Congregational Church, who was government teacher at Point Barrow, is temporarily ministering to the spiritual needs of the Eskimos, but the great need is for a minister there who is also a physician or a well qualified physician who has taken ministerial orders.

"Life is not impossible at Point Barrow or uncomfortable if one knows how to live there and has that cheerful Christian spirit that brings contentment anywhere. It is a rare opportunity for fine service. The children of Dr. Marsh and Mr. Spriggs were born at Point Barrow and are models of vigorous health. Will not some consecrated physician give himself to this fine service? He should be a married man, but whoever goes there should go to stay at least for a term of years."

Missionary Brevities

—Elat in Africa, which has been regarded as one of the most remote and isolated stations of Presbyterian foreign mission work, now enjoys telephonic connection with the outside world. The telephone line runs down from Elat to the coast, where there is cable connection.

—A new card just published by the Foreign Board in New York sums up the statistics of the board's current work in compressed form as follows: The Field—Twenty-seven missions in seventeen countries, 162 principal stations. The Force—1,235 American missionaries, 5,285 native workers. The Funds—$1,817,722 received from all sources at home; $501,192 received from native sources on the field. The work is divided into four sections, evangelistic, educational, medical and literary, as follows: Evangelistic—678 organized churches with 122,009 communicant members; over 15,500 new members added last year; 136,846 studying the Bible in our Sunday schools. Educational—60,902 students in 1,721 schools and colleges; more than 500 students preparing for the ministry. Medical—Nearly 500,000 patients in 191 hospitals and dispensaries in charge of American physicians, with large native staff. Literary—155,773,673 pages of the Scriptures and other Christian literature issued from nine presses. Headquarters, 156 5th avenue, New York City.

Board Notes and Announcements

—The Friday morning meeting in Chicago was led by Mrs. Samuel Dickey, secretary for Syria. She gave interesting sidelights from the letters of a friend who had opposed missions until her husband's business made her live for years in one of the darkest of Moslem lands; now she delights to lend a hand by teaching in the mission schools and by telling her correspondents of the good they can do there by sending books and magazines. This led Mrs. Doolittle of Sidon to speak of the help such literature had given in Syria, especially one of Dr. Grenfell's books, which was passed around until literally worn out. The mission study secretary called attention to two books obtainable here, "Fifty Missionary Heroes Every Boy and Girl Should Know ($1), by Miss Julia H. Johnston, and "Love Stories of Great Missionaries" (50 cents), by Miss Belle M. Brain. The Persia secretary had letters from Mrs. Van Hook and Miss Beaber of Tabriz, whose report of the girls' school brought cheering news from Miss Helen Grove and her Moslem girls.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

January 4, 1914—Jesus and the Children

Everyday View of the Lesson

By J. L. Scott

Lesson Text, Mark 9:30-41; 10:13-16. Golden Text, I. Peter 5:5: Gird yourselves with humility, to serve one another: for God resisteth the proud, but giveth grace to the humble.

Last year's lessons form a preface to this year's. We began with chaos and have arrived at childhood. There were no children at the beginning of our course last year. Adam was never a child nor was Eve. They were created, not born. But the race as we know it was once a child. Everything seems to have its infancy. Ideas, too, grow. Their origin is as mysterious as life. There was a time when every great truth stood alone. It was a child, and the only one of its kind.

One year ago we were being introduced to Genesis, or the "beginnings." How do things begin in that first chapter? The opening verse records a miracle, else it is a record of ageless time. But truth may live in a small house, and in all literature so great a truth has never before been compressed into so few words. Even the idea of the unity of God was once a child. Abraham carried it like a nursing father across the desert, and when he died transmitted it as a priceless legacy to his son. That thought was the battle center of all the wars and tumults of the stirring scenes through which we have passed.

Jesus Would Dispel Disciples' Illusions Concerning Kingdom

Now we are to exchange Old Testament history for New. A year ago we were on this very ground. The epileptic boy had just been healed and we, with the Master, were on the way to Capernaum, when the international lesson committee sent us back to the creation. And now we find ourselves once more in Capernaum and in the very house where we were one year ago.

The healing of the boy, together with the scene upon the mountain, had given a new impetus to the disciples' expectation that the kingdom of God was not far away. But Jesus would dispel the illusion. Instead of a kingdom they were to meet the greatest disappointment of their lives. "For the Son of man shall be delivered unto the chief priests and the scribes. . . . and they shall kill him; and after three days he shall rise again."

Those words fell like frost on the bright May morning of their dream. And yet they had no idea what the Master meant. They did not understand simply because it was impossible that they should. Their own expectation and the expectation of their fathers was against it. For a thousand years the winds of prophecy had been blowing from a different direction and the trees were all leaning another way.

After Personal Experience Only Can We Accept Some Truths

It was only by faith that they could believe, and faith they did not have. This is true in every life. God's words are often robbed of their evident meaning simply because they do not accord with prejudice or some long cherished thought. But some truths must become a part of our own experience before we can accept them. The disciples were afraid to ask further, and so ofttimes are we. They still clung to their old theories of a kingdom in the face of all that Jesus had said.

The disciples needed to go over the child lesson, so that they might comprehend the truth. Evil is often the result of ignorance rather than of purpose and the truth may be too subtle to be understood. A child is more easily comprehended than an idea, so Jesus placed a little child in their presence and declared that whosoever received even one of such children in his name received him. Greatness in his kingdom was the very opposite of their conception of it.

But for the time his meaning was lost. Sunday school teachers become discouraged. Their teaching fails of appreciation, hence they conclude that the fault lies within themselves. In some instances it does, but not always. Jesus was the Master Teacher of the ages, but no one ever had more reason to be discouraged. The disciples failed to comprehend. With the illustration and the idea both staring them in the face they looked and saw nothing. But no teacher ever understood the value "line upon line" better than did the Christ. This very lesson must be repeated.

Truth Concerning Kingdom of God Is Still Not Understood

When the fathers and mothers brought their children to receive His blessing the disciples, unmindful of what they had heard, had no words but censure. Jesus was moved with indignation. "Suffer the little children to come unto me; forbid them not: for to such belongeth the kingdom of God." Nothing more fiery ever fell from his lips. The disciples, contending for the highest positions in his favor, saw themselves thrust aside and children enthroned in their stead. That they fully comprehended all that was meant is not probable.

Since then 2,000 years have passed and the kingdom of God is still misunderstood. We look for it among the ambitious and the great, while in the heart of childhood alone it may be found. Parents often unconsciously listen to the voice of the disciple spirit rather than to the Christ. Instead of bringing their children to the Saviour and leaving them there, they wait, as they say, "until they know what they are doing." In the meantime the world has beckoned them away and without the touch of Jesus they pass through life.

The Lesson Verse by Verse

By A. C. Zenos

ANALYSIS—The story of the lesson revolves about four expressions of the mind of Jesus. The first is the result of his determination to come out of his temporary retirement in the mountainous territory of the neighborhood of Cæsarea Philippi. It consists in his prediction of the passion. The second was occasioned by the dispute among the disciples as to who should have precedence in the kingdom presently to be established by the Master. It consists in the exhortation to childlike humility reenforced by the object lesson of the "child in the midst." The third was based on the report made by John that a certain stranger was using his name in working miraculous cures of mental disorder. It consists in the declaration that even the implicit and unconfessed discipleship that accepts his rule and power in working is true discipleship. The fourth was given upon the bringing to him of the children that he might bless them. It consists in his manifestation of special regard and affection for the little ones.

Prediction of Jesus' Suffering and Death Source of Great Perplexity

Jesus had already told his disciples that he must needs submit to be delivered into the hands of his enemies and be put to death (Mark 8:31). But the teaching was so revolutionary, so unexpected, that they failed to grasp it. It was absolutely necessary that it should be repeated. And the time to repeat it was just as the group was about to reenter the life from which they had for a time withdrawn. In the next few days developments would take place which could be fully understood only in the light of the knowledge of his true Messiahship.

Verse 30—"He would not that any man should know it." Know what? That he taught his disciples that he must suffer and die. The publication of this fact was bound to confuse men and interfere with his plans.

Verses 31, 32—It was not, as has sometimes been said, a belief current among the Jews about the expected Messiah that he must suffer and be put to death. To his disciples this had been an abhorrent thought. To the Jews it had to be justified at Pentecost by the quotation of prophecy (Acts 2:25-27). Jesus was obliged to predict his suffering three times; and even those who heard the prediction were shocked and distressed beyond expression. Even the prediction "after three days he shall rise again" was at the time a source of perplexity.

Verse 33—"He asked"—not for the sake of information. Jesus often asked questions to draw out a clear expression of mind from his followers. In this particular case the sequel shows that he knew, either because he had overheard their conversation or in some other way, just what they had discussed.

Verse 34—"They held their peace." They were ashamed, because they knew his attitude and spirit and what verdict to expect from him on their own self-seeking.

Wish to Excel May, if Properly Directed, Be Put to Supreme Use

Verse 35—"If any man would be first." There is no condemnation of the wish to excel. To climb to the top of the ladder is a desire that cannot be repressed, but it can be directed, and Jesus shows to what supreme use it may be put. Let the ambition be to serve.

Verses 36, 37—To take a lowly place is not an easy thing for one who is conscious of power. If in obedience to a right impulse or of pressure from without he does so, it may become an empty form. What is needed is the cultivation of the spirit of humility which will associate with children ("receive them") in Christ's name, i. e., because of having accepted Christ and his mind as one's rule of life.

Verse 38—Jesus' miracle working power had evidently come to be widely known; and as it was used by his disciples through the utterance of his name, so it was also used by those outside this narrower circle, and with the same result. Since the power was not magical, but only concealed from the common eye and the common reach, and since it was associated with his personality, there is no real difficulty in understanding that it should be available to those who had recognized its presence and its association with his personality; but it raised the serious question of the relation of such persons to the circle of his open followers. John forbade the use of Jesus' power by one who did not belong to the group.

Jesus' Ministry and Benefits Not to Be Limited by Externals

Verses 39, 40—Jesus' attitude in this affair reveals once again that he looked upon his ministry and its benefits as not to be limited by outward names and associations. The mere acceptance and use of the good he had brought into the world should mean discipleship of a certain type. There is such a thing as "extramural Christianity." It is, to be sure, only potential or germinal Christianity, but it may easily be developed into the positive and actual type. Where the germ of life is, decay may enter, but it has not yet actually entered (verse 40). There is also a discipleship that manifests itself only in the doing of good deeds. They must, however, be deeds done for the sake of Christ. The "cup of water" must be given because he who gives it is Christ's. And even so, there is no encouragement here toward any inferior types of discipleship. For while such well-doing is assured of its ("his") reward, there is surely a higher reward for the more intimate, more energetic and fruitful discipleship which takes Jesus as Master, without reserve and openly.

Chapter 10:13—"They brought. . . . little children." Was it because they had heard that he had taken a little child and "set him in the midst of them"? Or was it because they expected that the touch of the miracle worker would somehow impart a mysterious blessing to the children? At all events his personal feeling toward the children was dimly understood. "The disciples rebuked them." He was concerned with the exalted and dignified work of establishing the kingdom of God—how could he be expected to waste his time and energy with mere children?

Verse 14—"He was moved to indignation." Such a misunderstanding both of his heart and of his mind and mission deserved it. The kingdom of God was for the children, and the children were just subjects for the kingdom of God.

Verse 15—What is more, none should receive the privileges of the kingdom of God except as children. God cannot become king of the soul that is possessed by a sense of its own sovereignty as against his. Only as that sense is superseded and supplanted by the consciousness of need for guidance and protection will the reign of God in the soul begin.

Verse 16—Thus Jesus at the same time expressed the tender affection of his own heart and symbolized the character and conditions of membership in the kingdom.

DEVOTIONAL SERVICE

BY EDWARD ARTHUR WICHER

Week Beginning December 28, 1913

TOPIC—Servants watching. Luke 12:35-40.

The exhortation to watching occupies a large place in the teaching of Jesus during the latter part of his ministry. His words are especially addressed to the circle of his disciples. There is evidently a fear in his mind lest they should fail to watch; and he would forewarn and forearm them. All around the little company of believers he sees the rising menace of Jewish hatred and scorn, of Roman antipathy and opposition. He sees the more serious menace of worldly ambition growing up within the very heart of the company of his chosen followers. They do not themselves see the danger, and he trembles for them lest their faith fail. Therefore he bestows upon them his repeated exhortations to vigilance and loyalty.

Two metaphors are used in our passage, that of the servants waiting for their master's return and that of the assault of the thief.

The former of these is a sort of condensation of the parable of the ten virgins with the addition of those features which refer to the serving of the servants by their lord. In this parable the lord of the house does not go to his own wedding but returns home late in the night from the wedding of another man. It is he who knocks on the outside of the door, and the question is whether he shall at once obtain admission.

He is immediately admitted. His servants have been watching for him and have kept their lights burning on purpose to greet him.

Then follows the unexpected. The master girds himself, prepares for his servants a meal and serves them. The usual course between master and servants is set forth in chapter 17:7-10. Here the relations are reversed. It is the master who waits upon the servants. Doubtless these words must have recurred to the minds of the disciples when Jesus washed their feet upon the night of the last Passover. But this latter idea must not be read into the present passage; for here the Master is concerned simply to show the importance of the servants' being prepared to serve their lord immediately upon his call and the greatness of the favor he will show them in return.

The "thief in the night" is a proverbial expression for unexpected events, especially for the last judgment. But in this connection it is sufficient to say that our Lord warns his disciples that they are to be ready at all times for the struggle of the kingdom of God (v. 31), lest the hour of their testing come upon them suddenly and they be overcome, as the householder by the thief who digs through his wall in the night.

Under the one symbol the servants who failed to watch might miss the joy of the master's company, the feast and the favor. Under the other the careless possessor of treasure might be robbed of his wealth of soul. Under the one figure the servant may fail through lack of vigilance to obtain what he might have had; under the other figure he loses what he has already obtained.

Here are some of the things that keep us from watching and leave us off our guard when the thief appears.

Selfish ambition is a dangerous enemy of our beautiful house, because it always professes to be bringing something instead of being the ally of the thief who would despoil us of everything. James and John nearly lost all they had of spiritual worth through the assault of desire to get for themselves a prominent place in the world. While they wanted earthly greatness they could not but lose greatness of soul. It required long watching on their part to obtain the mastery of their own spirits, and thus an abiding sway over the treasures of their house.

Slothfulness is an opiate that will put us to sleep when we should be watching. It is a terrible thing for Christian men to lose the power of working for Christ, of speaking a brave word of faith and courage. If we know the good that we ought to do and do not do it, we shall soon lose our hold on the good we already have. Many of God's people need to be saved from an easy chair. They have felt themselves so secure, so comfortably at ease, that they have fallen asleep and ceased to watch. And their judgment is nigh.

Insincerity will drug the soul so that it can no longer be awakened.

We need to examine ourselves, to search ourselves in the light of God's truth, to wake and continue watchful. During the year that is gone have we done the deeds that we might have done? Have we been the men we might have been? To one and another of our comrades the sudden test has come. To us, too, it must come; whether in the early or the late watch, we cannot tell. Only this we know, that sometime the trial will come. Nor can we in a moment gird ourselves with strength to meet the sudden testing. Only the patient discipline of the previous watching will help us then. If we are found off guard, we are lost.

The exhortation to watching is constantly conjoined with that to prayer. These two are indispensable. If we would watch aright, we must pray; for it is the vigil of prayer that prevents sleep.

The long, dark watches of the night are passing; the day dawn begins to touch with faint streaks of silver the line of distant hills. Soon our Lord will come in his glory.

Lift up your hearts, ye sorrowful people, for the day of your comfort draweth near. Lift up your eyes, ye weary watchers, for behold! the awful presence, the welcome presence, the coming glory of the King.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S SERVICE

COMMENTS IN BRIEF BY WILLIAM T. ELLIS

January 4, 1914

THE GREATEST SENTENCE IN SPEECH

TOPIC—Twelve great verses. I. The salvation verse. John 3:16.

During the year 1914 the young people's societies will consider twelve great verses of the Scripture, one each month. And, naturally, the greatest is put first, an appropriate topic for the first meeting of the new year. This is John 3:16, often called "the golden text of the Bible"—"For God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on him should not perish, but have eternal life." That is the epitome of the gospel.

Some utterances are dependent upon the individual mood for their value. This one strikes down to the root of all thinking and all living, for it deals with the forever—the interesting theme of the relationship between man and God. The oldest thought of the human race is and forever has been about God. Man is more interested in that theme than in any other. All the varied forms of religion, past and present, are but manifestations of that interest. This utterance of Jesus reveals that God's attitude toward man is one of love. The inadequate religions that have not known Christ have looked upon the supreme being as a remote Power, to be propitiated. Jesus brought the radical new teaching that God is to be loved, and that he looks upon mankind as a father looks upon his children.

Some of us are brooding over troubles which, could we but see them in their true proportions, are really very small. Let us measure them, in an hour of meditation, with the majestic verities of this verse, with its eternal and instant implications and applications.

There is salvation in this great verse. It is the Father's message to the prodigal. It is the lamp forever shining in the window of the home, to light returning wanderers. It is a love letter, overflowing with forgiveness, to the erring one. It is the Father's signet ring, the proof that there is life and pardon and joy by the merit of the son.

Occasionally I have borne messages from children in foreign lands to parents in this country. And what a welcome I have received, because I came in the name of the son. Not for myself but for the son's sake I was given glad greeting. The experience faintly mirrors the great truth of this verse. The Father accepts us in the Beloved. It is the friendship of Christ that opens wide the doors of the Father's house to us. His is the name, and the only name, whereby comes salvation.

One of the tragedies of life with which a traveler becomes familiar is the parting of kindred and friends at steamship docks and railroad stations. The pictures which the thought calls up pain the heart even as the words are penned. What indescribable anguish! Oh, the breaking mother hearts, as sons sail away! Woe is the separation of husband and wife! Yet all these tragic separations only faintly figure forth what it must have cost the Father in heaven to send forth his Son, and upon such a mission. Yes, he "so loved" that he "gave his only begotten Son." Well may the apostle who saw deepest into the truth of love cry "Herein is love." Only the unclouded vision of eternity will enable us to understand the price the Father heart paid for the winning back of the wandering children.

Here runs an eternal law: "God so loved . . . that he gave." Love always gives. That is its one most characteristic trait. If it does not give it is not love. Selfishness seeks; love lavishes. From the mother who pours out her life in ministry to her babe, to the veteran patriot who gladly dies on the battlefield from love of country, this one trait of self-giving is the essential work of love. By this test may we know the genuineness and sacredness of any love whatsoever. Only the giving love is the living love.

The false notion that some things are "too good to be true" sometimes colors our thinking about the grace of God. It seems incredible that the greatest boon in the universe, salvation, should be granted for mere faith in the Saviour. But we need to remember that in the loving economy of God nothing is "too good to be true." And all the best things of life, such as love, and fresh air, and ability to think, and good health, are not gained by purchase or traffic, but are like this greatest boon of all, free and unmerited gifts. Moreover, if we had to traffic for salvation, what medium of exchange could we offer that would buy so great a treasure? If salvation is to be had at all, it must be by royal bounty of the King, who is also a Father.

Nearness to the beloved is love's greatest desire. Because he loves us, God has planned to gather all his great family close to himself.

Every commodity is to be valued in the terms of its cost. If any be tempted to view salvation lightly, let him consider what it costs the Father and the Son.

To Add Interest to the Meeting

Consecration meetings are sometimes the poorest meetings of the month, whereas they should be the best. The prayer meeting committee can well bend every effort to prevent pauses. For this particular meeting organize a "pause committee" of persons who will take part—briefly—when none else seems ready. Plan the week before to urge young or bashful members to take part.

Some societies have members who repeatedly answer merely "present" to the roll call, despite their pledge. This condition presents a difficult problem. They set a bad example, fail to develop themselves and hold back the growth of the society.

If your society has faced the west wall for every meeting last year, try the north wall for this one. Merely a rearrangement of chairs often injects spice into meetings.

NEW BOOKS

Some New Fiction

A Changed Man, by Thomas Hardy. One of the season's notable literary offerings in the domain of fiction is this volume of twelve short stories, representative of the author's best work. The majority of readers will undoubtedly pronounce the title story and "The Romantic Adventures of a Milkmaid" the most satisfying. The first may call forth the old adage of pessimism, but it is life stuff; the last, though complex in the variety of emotion it depicts, is never harrowing or depressing and ends in a highly satisfactory manner. All who love fiction which is as sound in its philosophy as it is true in its art will gladly give this volume a place on their book shelves. [Harper and Brothers, New York. $1.35 net.

General John Regan, by G. A. Birmingham (Canon Hannay). This is the humorous story of a facetious American millionaire who comes across the sleepy Irish village of Ballymoy and resolves to wake the place up. He asks for the statue of General John Regan—the deliverer of Bolivia. When told there is none he professes grieved surprise. Dr. O'Grady, a diplomatic native, leaps into the breach and manages a movement for buying a ready-made statue. The doctor conceives the idea of writing the lord lieutenant of Ireland to unveil the monument to this imaginary character. After many complications the rich American reappears and says he has had lots of fun—as have the readers of the book. [George H. Doran Company, New York. $1.20 net.

The Keeper of the Vineyard, by Caroline Abbot Stanley. The romance of an attractive young Chicago school teacher who has inherited the care of four young orphans. The background is a primitive locality in the Ozark mountains where the teacher has taken her brood to a farm to raise. There is much humor in the homely situations she must combat until she finally succeeds in establishing a school that unites the community in calling her blessed; her hardships end in a marriage to a surgeon-farmer. If Mrs. Stanley's characters were a little more virile her novel would have a wider appeal. [Fleming H. Revell Company, New York. $1.25.

The Lovely Lady, by Mary Austin, is a romance of modern life into which the author has delicately infused a mid-Victorian quality. It is not in any way a remarkable story; still one wonders how Mrs. Austin achieved it—a book without a problem or the suggestion of an illicit love seems almost daring, judged by present-day standards. "Peter" is a clean, wholesome lad of high ideals and noble purpose, whose lodestar is "The Lovely Lady." How he finds her after twice mistaking the shadow for the substance makes a story of mildly exciting but pleasing interest. [Doubleday, Page and Company, New York. $1 net.

A Mainsail Haul, by John Masefield, is a second and enlarged edition of short stories which first appeared in 1903. Tales of the sea, sailors' yarns, they are fanciful, weird and superstitious. Although they are original and intensely vital, these stories are not of a nature to strongly appeal to the average landsman, however much we may admire the author of "Dauber" and "The Widow in Bye Street." [Macmillan Company, New York. $1.25 net.

What Happened in the Night, and Other Stories, by James Hopper. Most of these dainty short stories by Mr. Hopper have children for the main characters, which fact doesn't mean that they are children's stories; there is much substance as well as subtlety in them. Some of them are romantic, some realistic and others have the appeal of homely pathos. [Henry Holt and Company, New York. $1.25 net.

The Lure of the Little Drum, by Margaret Peterson. Just what the requirements of the Melrose $1,250 prize were the reviewer doesn't know, nor did a careful reading of this novel disclose why Messrs. Conrad and Locke chose it as the winner over any one of a dozen other novels in this season's output. Technically it is well done, but it seems to lack the charm of poise and personality that is necessary to the really distinctive story. Esther, Miss Peterson's erotic heroine, is the foil in a plot that involves the social and political leaders of an English army post in India; her beauty had enslaved the manly Gerald Hamilton until he nearly forced her into their happy marriage, knowing that she was a prey to the charm of an unprincipled Oxford-bred native. The poignancy of her flight, her humiliation and suffering in the harem and her tragic end make a forceful and dramatic climax. [G. P. Putman's Sons, New York. $1.35 net.

Thackeray's Haunts in London

In Thackeray's London, by F. Hopkinson Smith. A great many people have come to the decision that Hopkinson Smith is as much an artist as he is novelist—perhaps even that he excels in the first capacity. His new book would seem to prove that opinion; for while his text is full of the most delightful descriptions of the homes and haunts of Thackeray and his characters, the charcoal drawings which illustrate his little journeys are so beautifully done that one wants to take them all out and frame them. There's one of the room in which Colonel Newcome died that gives the most intimate sense of that gentleman's presence; there's a wonderful conception of the Reform Club whose reserved and chilly atmosphere was warmed by Thackeray's genial personality even down to the week of his death; and there are many other sketches of his chambers in Hare and Lamb court, of the inns and taverns where he and, in an earlier time, Goldsmith and others used to eat, of Fleet street and St. Paul's, of London bridge—all of them exquisite things which make this book one of the most fascinating the season has produced. The text is intimate, chatty, rich in literary associations; the binding is particularly artistic. [Doubleday, Page and Company, New York.

Studies of Public Questions

On Board the Good Ship Earth, by Herbert Quick. Mr. Quick is a magician and sociologist. In his new book one looks through an enchanted crystal and sees the earth in its beginning, in its maturity and then at its fall. Kingdoms appear here and there, nations rise, have their day of power and fall to make way for others. As the crystal turns around, various parts of the earth are shown at close quarters—the millions of China crying for bread and living on a nearly exhausted land, the nations warring with each other, pestilence and famine working through the centuries. In the space of a few minutes the magic crystal reveals the work of æons, shows those creatures who call themselves "lords of creation" wasting their natural resources in a wild, spendthrift fashion, never thinking of the time that will surely come when these priceless stores will be exhausted. One sees the population of these creatures growing tremendously under the influence of medical science. Finally one gazes into the future of the human race, discovering with wonder and dread that the population is vastly increased, but the nations are warring with each other over the scanty resources that have been left by the preceding generations. The last visions in the crystal show a terrible tragedy enacted. The populations have decreased tremendously, and those creatures that are left are starving. It is only a short time, a few centuries perhaps, until the whole human race will be extinguished. We know of no man of imagination who has given in such a short space the beginnings and the endings of the human race through the centuries in quite so broad a fashion. National Supremacy: Treaty Power vs. State Power, by Edward S. Corwin of Princeton University, goes thoroughly into a difficult subject, being a discussion of one phase of the unending competition between the doctrines of national supremacy and state rights. It deals first with the source of all arguments on the subject—the constitution; it considers these arguments impartially from all viewpoints and presents a clear idea of the question to thoughtful readers. The author concludes his argument with the statement that "the treaty power of the United States is not constitutionally restricted by the powers of the states," and that there is no real danger to the powers of the states to be anticipated from this doctrine. The New Standard Dictionary

THE NEW STANDARD DICTIONARY OF THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE, edited by Isaac K. Funk and others. The new edition of the Funk and Wagnalls dictionary is impressive. Even a brief examination would compel recognition of the vast amount of labor and research necessary to the production of this comprehensive work, but a more careful inspection will reveal that the labor has been painstaking and the research scholarly in its discrimination. The prime requirements of the average user of a dictionary are a knowledge of the spelling, pronunciation and meaning of words, and in all these respects the Standard will be satisfying. Pronunciation is carefully indicated and definitions are full and clear. Words of similar meaning are differentiated by full presentation of synonyms and antonyms, a feature of utmost value to the careful student of English. But in addition to the mere treatment of words as such, there is an abundance of information for which ordinarily the searcher would be compelled to consult a cyclopedia. The plates and smaller illustrations are of high excellence. But the reviewer, from his viewpoint as a corrector for the press who has had dictionaries as his familiar companions for a quarter century, believes that some criticism may be offered on the manner in which all this richness is presented. The claim is made that the Standard has reduced the compounding of words to a logical system. A careful inspection of the method by which the editors seek to accomplish this does not indicate that they have succeeded, and the results of the attempt are not always pleasing. The advantage of the "single vocabulary" idea may be questioned. Increasing the vocabulary by the insertion of proper names, etc., does not tend to facilitate the finding of a word. Proper names should be in appendices, and so also should the "simplified spelling" forms, if they must be given space at all. They have been accorded a very limited acceptance since the Standard gave them room in its first edition. It is the province of the lexicographer to record the natural development of a language, and not to seek to force it in a wholesale and artificial way. There is a lack of uniformity of method in listing compounds under one or the other of their components. They would be more readily found if placed alphabetically in the vocabulary. The wisdom of giving first the most common meaning of a word is open to doubt. The ordinary man knows the ordinary meaning of the ordinary word. A vast number of English words have their most common use not in their primary but in a derived meaning, and a better purpose is served by allowing the order of definitions to show as far as possible the history of the word. But these things are matters of opinion, and comparatively minor matters at that. The Standard, in the twenty years since the publication of the first edition, has made a place for itself among English lexicographic authorities, and this new edition, with its completeness and its excellent features, registers a great advance over its predecessor. The Open Hearth

Teaching Outweighs Preaching ?

W. H. Stubblebine says in the Open Hearth of recent date: "I am becoming more and more convinced that the church is being preached to death." I heartily agree with him. I am not a preacher, but more than fifty years of my life have been spent in a minister's home. I believe that preaching has "gone to seed." Much "new wine" is being wasted by putting it into "old wine skins." In the days of the apostles, when there were no printing presses to disseminate knowledge, preaching was about the only way to reach people with the truth. Yet Christ put teaching before preaching. Teaching is mentioned more than twice as many times as preaching in the gospels. Three times Jesus is said to have gone about "teaching and preaching"—never "preaching and teaching." Teaching occupies the same relative prominence in the Acts and in the epistles. Paul wrote to Timothy: "The things which thou hast heard from me . . . commit thou to faithful men who shall be able to teach"—not preach.

Moreover, the preaching of the present day bears little resemblance to the preaching of Christ and the disciples, which was chiefly a proclamation of the gospel and a call to repentance. The best modern pulpit themes are treated exhaustively in books and magazines, and even the daily paper publishes sermons and articles on topics which were formerly treated only from the pulpit. Many modern sermons are largely rehashes from such books and papers. They are not usually equal to the original sources which the reading public has already had access to. But they are above the heads of those who do not read, and beyond the comprehension of the young. The years of greatest susceptibility to religious teaching are allowed to slip by without securing conversion, unless an evangelist is called in, or a faithful Sunday school teacher or godly parents do this work of teaching. I believe that the "church school," which is already in the thought of many men, is the coming "new bottle" for the new methods of religious teaching which are being worked out in which all the various societies and suborganizations of the church will be coordinated and simplified, and in which systematic teaching of the Bible and methods of religious work for the common people will take the place of haphazard pulpit themes and preaching be shortened into evangelism.

Let the classroom take the place of the pulpit except for evangelistic work. Occupy the best hours of the Sabbath with this work and cut out the present morning service in dress parade.

A Sarcastic Osteopath

In your Dec. 4 issue, where you speak of the "Ozone Theory a Delusion," you display a degree of ignorance which I cannot pass unchallenged. When our religious press suffers from such a dearth of "spiritual food" as to necessitate the publishing of such ideas so very foreign to such papers, I feel that it is high time the Wayfarer is called in home and required to do duty along the lake shore, where he might garner an idea upon which we might feast our starving souls. The criticism being hurled at the ozone treatment is about as justifiable as that which our friends hurled at one C. Columbus when he declared that our earth is a sphere, or that which was flung at Harvey when he told his coworkers that the blood passes from the arteries to the veins through the capillary system, or that which was handed to the late Koch when he gave to the world his germ theory for tuberculosis.

In the first place, parson, ozone is not made by a chemical process; neither is it used to make pure air. The chemist does not live who can make ozone from phosphorus, fluorine, etc. Ozone is air which has had the impurities removed or destroyed by electrical sparks, and you have enjoyed the exhilarating effect of its purity yourself if you have ever ventured out into God's country after one of his glorious thunderstorms where there has been a bit of electricity. You say, "There is no air so good as outdoor air and the best way to get it is to open a door or window." Such wisdom! What are you going to do with an inside office down

The First Christmas Gifts

"Gold, frankincense and myrrh" were the first Christmas gifts. Ancient wise men brought them from afar and gave them to Him. He did not need them save as they needed to give them to Him. They gave Him the best.

The veterans of the Cross and the desolate widows and orphans, though they are in need of the barest necessities of life—food, fuel, clothing—do not need such things half so much as the Church needs to give them for His sake in whose service they have spent their lives.

O Church, make loving pilgrimage to Bethlehem this Christmastide and bring your best gifts to Him. If you seek Him, you may find Him in "one of these least, His brethren." By your prayer and your sacrifice you may bring Christmas cheer to the enfeebled minister and the weary laden, heavy widow of the deceased minister. Doing this will be giving "gold, frankincense and myrrh" to Him.

along the loop district or a subway station thirty feet underground in New York? Shall we open the door or window and let in a little smoke, dust and germs? Electrical ozonators operated in the places make life bearable for the unfortunate ones who are doing their work day by day and contributing their mite to the priest, rector, bishop or pastor that he may go out onto God's mighty pine-clad mountain tops and breathe in the ozone in all its purity, increasing in "fleshly wisdom" day by day.

Doctor of Divinity Seconds the Motion

A correspondent signing himself "B." makes the suggestion that the letters "D. D." and other letters signifying honorary degrees be omitted after the names of ministers in the roll in the Assembly minutes. "B." says that such omission would be in line with the Presbyterian doctrine of the parity of the clergy. Perhaps so. At any rate, the roll in the minutes would be more dignified were the D.'s of every kind omitted. Let them be cut off. "B." says this minor reform will never be made unless the laymen strike the blow. Very likely. But let me say, as pastor of a city church and as the possessor of the degree of doctor of divinity myself, that if the laymen will strike the blow they will be surprised at the hearty amen that will arise from the ranks of the ministerial brethren. Where the "Smoke Ships" Will Come

And lastly, it is English commerce which, until recent years, has been practically supreme and has held a monopoly in developing the trade of Arabia. Even today there is not a spool of thread in Nejd or a jackknife in Jebel Shammar that did not come up the Persian gulf in an English ship. All the people of Kuweit and the Bedouins for a great distance roundabout eat rice from Rangoon that has come to them in British ships. The rupee and not the piastre is the standard of value along the whole Arabian coast from Aden to Busrah. England has consulates and consular agents in nearly every large coast town of Arabia, and every year her consuls are exercising more authority and have greater prestige. Many of the Arab merchants have made attempts to secure British protection and become British subjects. It is not because they love Turkey less, as representing their great pan-Islamic ideas, but that they love the rupee more, and protection in trade as well as development of any port in the gulf is directly dependent on the pax Britannica and the justice which is always found under the shadow of the union jack. These may seem strong words for an American missionary to use, but they represent a growing conviction after residing on the Persian gulf for many years.

Meanwhile, we who are outsiders in the game of diplomacy, and as Americans have no interest in the land-grabbing of European powers, are watching the progress of the Bagdad railway and the schemes for the development and irrigation of the Euphrates valley by the Young Turkish party, as well as England's policy in the Persian gulf, with the deepest interest. All this part of the world affords the sad spectacle of the hopeless fall of ancient and brilliant civilizations. It will require much labor to restore what has once been destroyed, to render barren lands again habitable and introduce modern progress by railway and irrigation. It is possible, I believe, only by European supervision, as has been proved over and over again in other parts of the world, and most recently and remarkably in Egypt. It is possible that when the new railway is opened and Kuweit becomes a second Port Said, the agriculturist in North Arabia will prevail over the nomad and construction take the place of destruction.

ROYAL BAKING POWDER
Adds Healthful Qualities to the Food

It is possible that even in our day the Bedouins may beat their swords into plowshares and their spears into pruning hooks, but it will be a long struggle against the inertia of the past. To us who are missionaries it seems that only moral and spiritual forces are sufficient to produce this change. Yet we all hope to see some future Lord Cromer make the Euphrates-Tigris valley a second Egypt, and are as anxious as all the other people in the Nearer East to engage a Pullman sleeper at Kuweit for Paris.

Gifts of the Christmas Angels

"And we named you Angela. Why, dear—do you remember?"

Angela smiled sleepily from her mother's shoulder.

"Because," she drowsed, "because the—the Christmas—angels—brought——" But Angela had drifted off into the land of dreams.

"He—won't—be—tired," she aroused enough to murmur as her mother tucked her into bed.

Mrs. Bronson slipped a small candy cane and an orange into the little stocking waving joyously in the fireplace. It was all she could afford to buy for the child the Christmas angels had brought. Those angels had carried daddy away two years before, and she and Angela had come down from the "high, high mountains" to the big city, where there was work for mothers of little girls.

The neighbors were not far away here—they were very, very close, as close even as the next room. For Angela's mother rented just one room in the old house that once had been a mansion. And other people rented just one room, too. That was why Angela and her mother had so many neighbors, and why they lived so near.

Angela's mother drew her chair up close to the fire, which was fast dying down to coals, and thought about that once-upon-a-time Christmas and the baby the angels had brought. And she thought about the little white-painted cradle there on the floor and the towel dolly asleep in it till the Christmas dolly should come. And she wished—oh, how she did wish!—that she wasn't grown up and didn't know that Santa Claus did get tired, sometimes.

"Woo-o-o-o!" raged the wind against the window. "He—won't—get—tired!" drowsed once more the little sleepy voice. Angela was dreaming of reindeer and scurrying hoofs and a gay little driver, muffled from head to foot in furs.

In the next room Angela's mother heard as she sat there a sudden clamor of voices; then a door banged; then voices again, eager, loud, happy. Then someone rattled the knob of the door into her own room.

Angela's mother rose and unlocked and opened the door. The little Italian girl who lived in the next room burst in.

"Here," she cried, holding out with both hands a beautiful doll with golden curls, while every tight brown curl on her own small head bobbed with excitement. "For Angela The good Santa bring me two. I gif her one. Take!" she urged, as Angela's mother looked at her in silent amazement. "For Angela."

And Angela's mother did "take," with a grateful kiss upon the little, eager, upturned face.

* * * * *

On Christmas morning Angela's mother was early awake to kindle the fire and set the little stocking in the fireplace once more joyously astir. When the room was warm she went to the bed and, lifting the still sleeping little girl in her arms, she carried her over to the fire.

"Merry Christmas, dear!" she cried, kissing her awake. "Mother's baby that the angels brought!"

Angela aroused. "Brought" reminded her of something and she reached out sleepily toward the little stocking that stirred joyously in the fireplace. Then her hand dropped and her eyes, still sleepy, drooped once more. Down, down, down the heavy eyelids slid — then stopped. Suddenly open flew Angela's eyes, and pat! went Angela's feet on the floor as she slid from her mother's lap. Down on her knees went Angela beside the white-painted cradle and with a little cry of joy she hugged to her heart the golden-haired dolly that magically had taken the place of the towel dolly, and had waited there for her all the dark night through.

Angela's mother watched with a choke in her throat her little girl that the angels had brought. "You see, dear," she said at last, "mother's baby was right. Santa wasn't too tired!"

Angela raised big, solemn eyes to her mother's face.

"The Christmas angels brought it, too," was all she said.

Cities to Join in Locating Strangers

Under the lead of the Chicago Brotherhood, arrangements are being made with the brotherhood or a similar organization in all the large cities of the country looking to an extension of the strangers' bureau work which has been done lately in Chicago and New York. It is expected that advertisements will be printed jointly by a number of the cities offering the assistance of local pastors in looking up people who have gone from smaller communities.

IN THE FIELD OF CHRISTIAN EFFORT

ISLAND CHURCHES ASK INDEPENDENCE

Philippine Synod was opened at Manila in October with a sermon by Rev. D. S. Hibbard of Silliman Institute, after which Rev. Monico Estrella was elected moderator. Part of two days was spent in hearing good reports from the several permanent committees.

The most interesting and important matter before the synod was the nationalization of the Presbyterian Church of the Philippine Islands. It was voted to petition the next General Assembly to set aside the Synod of the Philippines as a free and independent body as are many Presbyterian churches in other countries where our church carries on missionary work. It is most likely that this, if granted, will greatly encourage and strengthen the brethren and impress them with their added responsibilities and give them a strong desire to make their church a great power in their native land.

The conference of the missionaries began Oct. 6 and lasted a week. Rev. Charles Magill was elected president and Rev. J. H. Lamb secretary. The mornings were given to hearing reports from stations and the afternoons to the hearing of committee reports. The reports from the ten stations were all encouraging. About 1,000 members were received during the past year, making a total of more than 12,000 who have been received in our church since the beginning of the work. We have about forty-five missionaries, counting doctors, teachers and wives of pastors.

During the past year Cebu station has erected two dormitories, two residences and a church. Bohol has a new hospital. The new building for the Ellinwood school for girls will be erected this year.

The evangelistic work has made good progress during the year, although at times the political agitation has threatened to affect the work seriously. The number of Filipino pastors has increased almost 50 per cent during the year.

MR. STELZLE BUSY IN NEW TASK

Rev. Charles Stelzle as "consulting sociologist" has been devoting his attention largely to what he calls "one-day efficiency campaigns." The program outlined for these events includes a meeting for all the ministers of the town in the afternoon at which Mr. Stelzle speaks. At the supper hour Mr. Stelzle speaks to the laymen of the town, followed by a mass meeting of men and women. Such days have recently proved profitable and valuable in Adams, Mass., Elkhart, Ind., Freeport and Danville, Ill., and Lexington, Ky. The first town to ask Mr. Stelzle's bureau for a social survey is Fairport, N. Y. Mr. Stelzle has also been called upon to help fight no-license campaigns in Lynn and Newburyport, Mass.

PROMOTE SUNDAY SCHOOL ADVANCE

The Presbyterian missionaries of the West and Southwest met for conference in Linwood Boulevard church, Kansas City, recently. In connection with the conference Sabbath school institutes were held and addresses were made along practical and pedagogical lines by Rev. E. Morris Fergusson, Professor G. C. Fracker, Rev. S. R. Ferguson, R. F. Sulzer. The conference was directed by Dr. Alexander Henry of Philadelphia.

Growing out of this meeting there will be organized very soon a Presbyterian Sunday school association including the city and near-by localities, which will meet at stated periods to promote a more active and aggressive Sunday school work among the churches. There seems to be a very distinct need for such an organization.

New York Has New Temperance Leader

The New York State Anti-Saloon League has elected as its superintendent William H. Anderson, for five years past the superintendent of the Maryland league. Mr. Anderson made a remarkable record as a pugnacious yet very discreet and effective temperance leader in Illinois and has since improved that record greatly by his achievements in Maryland. Mr. Anderson will make the transfer early in the year.

Mr. Kane's Tithing Pamphlets

The tithing pamphlets into which Thomas Kane, known as "Layman," has gathered his writings on the tithe, as described in the editorial columns of this week's paper, may be obtained from Mr. Kane, together with other literature on the same subject, by sending 25 cents to Mr. Kane's office, 143 North Wabash avenue, Chicago.

Students Eager to Attend

It is announced by those in charge of the Student Volunteer convention at Kansas City next week that all of the colleges and universities have appointed their full number of delegates and many institutions have been refused additional representation. The University of Chicago will send sixty-five delegates and practically every institution in the country will be represented by one or more of its students who have promised to take up work on the foreign field if possible.

NOVEL CHRISTMAS PLANS

Ohio—Community Christmas celebration in Cleveland marks a new era in social uplift and is securing support of the churches. With the Associated Charities organization as clearing house, all the societies such as Salvation Army, Volunteers of America and Bethel Workers have withdrawn the usual public solicitation and stock at $1 a share was sold. The women selling Red Cross stamps also handled this community Christmas stock, with which the general celebration was financed.—One hundred poor children from the city will be entertained at Christmas dinner by the Sunday school and woman's guild of Clifton church, Cincinnati, Rev. D. M. Grant pastor. For eleven years this church has been taking the children to the suburbs and giving them a Christmas feast, with toys and candy. The church officers decided that even if the children of their own church could not be given a Christmas entertainment the children of the city would be taken care of first. Both will, however, be entertained.

OLDEST PARISH PAPER?

Westminster church, Dubuque, Iowa, in addition to having the oldest Sunday school superintendent in point of service, as recently announced in The Continent, has perhaps the oldest parish paper in the country. Phi Gamma, which is printed monthly in the interest of Westminster church, was founded twenty-nine years ago, when Dr. D. J. Burrell was pastor. Dr. Burrell is now head of the Pan-Presbyterian Alliance of the World and the pastor of the oldest church in New York City, the Marble Collegiate Reformed. Since the establishment of the paper it has continued with an unbroken history. The present editor is Professor E. T. Oldt of Dubuque German College.

TEACH YOUNG WOMEN THRIFT

The commission on thrift and efficiency appointed at the biennial convention of the Y. W. C. A. in Richmond last April is pushing its work. A personal account book is of value to all classes of women and is rapidly being adopted for use. Its logical arrangement makes personal bookkeeping an easy matter. The savings fund book to encourage association members in acquiring the habit of saving is being adopted by associations all over the country. When the amount reaches $5 the member is introduced to a bank and a bank account is opened. The book is a typical savings fund book, especially printed and supplied by the publication department of the national board.

IDEAS BY COOPERATION

A newspaper is one of the means of communication by which ideas travel. Railways open up a country and foster its development. Newspapers develop the minds of those who use them wisely. On this and adjoining pages of The Continent, for example, are scores of ideas which may be absorbed by even the most hurried reader. Not all of the plans used with success elsewhere can be adapted to your community, but some of them can be made available. Perhaps other persons can likewise get stimulus from some plan which has worked well in your church.

SCHOOL AND COLLEGE

Dedicate Laboratory—A large addition to the physical laboratory of the University of Chicago was dedicated on convocation day, Dec. 20. The building cost $200,000 and is the gift of the president of trustees, Martin A. Ryerson.

Offers Bible Course—The American Institute of Sacred Literature in connection with the University of Chicago is promoting this year two new Bible courses which are attracting considerable attention in various parts of the country. Both are prepared by Professor E. D. Burton.

Two Buildings for Center College—Two new buildings are being erected for Center College of Kentucky, one of which is a library costing $30,000. The other building replaces the gymnasium destroyed by fire some time ago and in addition will provide a social center for the students.

Brief Items—The natural science hall of Thornwell Orphanage, Clinton, S. C., is now being completed. It will contain the museum. The Lesh Infirmary, a three-story building, will not be completed and ready for opening until next September. —An adaptation of two comedies of Aristophanes was recently made at Beloit for a play by the students, "Votes for Women."

Various Institutions—Tuskegee Institute is asking for $164,000 to complete the amount needed for a comprehensive heating and power plant, water supply and sewerage system for the institution.—Vacancy in the board of trustees of Oberlin College caused by the death of L. H. Severance has been filled by the election of John F. Severance of Cleveland, of the class of 1885.

From Bellevue to Coe—Stephen W. Stookey, Ph. D., who has been president of Bellevue College for six years, has resigned. He came to his present position at a time of stress and strain, and his leadership has served the institution to advantage. Coe College, Cedar Rapids, Iowa, asks that he return to it, taking his old position as dean. He will assume his new work Jan. 1.

New Gymnasium for Kendall College—As a climax to a number of substantial and helpful improvements made during the past year, Henry Kendall College, Tulsa, Okla., is just completing a gymnasium which will meet all the needs of the athletic side of the school. By efforts of the financial secretary, Philip D. Dixon, the fund for the new gymnasium was raised in Tulsa in ten days' time. The building will be formally opened after the holidays. It has a seating capacity of 500, an orchestra section, a bowling alley, basket ball court, two large dressing rooms with showers, toilet and locker accommodations in each room. A woman is employed to coach the various girls' teams and care for their gymnasium work, while a competent coach is in charge of the boys.

Impressive Occasion—Dec. 9 Dr. George Emory Fellows was inaugurated president of Decatur College of James Millikin University. It was the most successful and impressive academic occasion since the opening of the university eleven years ago. The principal addresses were made by President James D. Moffat of Washington and Jefferson College, President William H. Black of Missouri Valley College, President John S. Nollen of Lake Forest, President Edmund J. James of the State University of Illinois and President Fellows. About fifty institutions were represented. The good work of President A. R. Taylor and his assistants during the past ten years was recognized and all felt this occasion marked the beginning of a new stage in the movement for a "greater Millikin."

WHAT THE Y. M. C. A. IS DOING

Shanghai, China—In spite of the recent troublous times in China the attendance at the Y. M. C. A. summer Bible conference reached 750, an increase of 50 per cent.—During a battle between the government and revolutionary forces the association led in the organization of relief work. In the gymnasium 400 refugees sought shelter every night.

New York—The association buildings on the West side, on 23rd street and Bedford branch in Brooklyn, last year had a total of 5,400 students registered in the classes of the Y. M. C. A. Associations at Philadelphia, Boston, Chicago, Los Angeles, Cleveland, Portland, Ore., Seattle, Detroit, Cambridge and Wilmerding each had more than 1,000 enrolled.

SUNDAY CLOSES JOHNSTOWN MEETINGS

"Billy" Sunday closed one of the most successful evangelistic campaigns he has ever held, Monday, Dec. 15, at Johnstown, Pa. The meetings had been in progress six weeks and there were almost 12,000 converts, in addition to a large number of reconsecrations. The need of organizing against the liquor traffic and against the granting of licenses was emphasized during the last two days with the result that 7,000 men, citizens of Cambria county, signed pledges to oppose the liquor traffic in every possible way.

CHURCHES TO UNITE DURING JANUARY

Joint Campaign by Various Denominations in Philadelphia—Congressman Hobson Urges Temperance in Talk to Men.

PHILADELPHIA — At a luncheon conference the past week at the Y. M. C. A. rooms, attended by nearly 200 ministers, the proposed January united missionary campaign was discussed. John Walton presided and W. E. Doughty presented plans for the greatest cooperative action ever taken in this country. Bishop Berry announced that the Methodist churches would go into it with vigor. Dr. George B. Adams said that the Baptists heartily favored the movement and Dr. J. Grant Newman reported Presbyterians greatly interested in its success. Each minister was asked to appoint a committee of five to enroll the men of their congregations. Ten big conferences will be held in the city during eight days in January, and twenty-five mass meetings will be held in the ten districts into which the city has been divided.

Would Join Two Churches—An earnest effort is being made to join as one pastoral charge the Third or "Old Pine" Street church and the Greenwich Street so long shepherded by Dr. William Hutton. Both are in the southern part of the city eight or ten squares apart and situated in missionary districts. The plan is for a single pastor and assistant.

Hobson Talks to Men on Temperance—Congressman Hobson of Alabama was recently the guest of Rev. J. B. C. Mackie, pastor of the Carmel Presbyterian church of Edge Hill, and addressed the men's association on temperance. With their guests from surrounding towns 500 men were present. Seven other towns not far distant also heard Mr. Hobson's exposure of the evils of the liquor traffic.

Brief Items—By the will of the late Dr. Herrick Johnson the sons of ten ministers who were former pupils of his in McCormick Seminary were bequeathed $100 each.—Rev. Walter Getty, at present secretary of the Presbyterian Brotherhood movement in this city, has received a call from the Greenside Avenue Church, Canonsburg, Pa.—The various gospel missions of the city have organized the International Union of Gospel Missions with J. P. McIntyre as president, Frank Dippel vice president, George Botsford treasurer and T. L. Fretz secretary.—The homecoming communion of the Chambers-Wylie church, Dr. J. Grant Newman pastor, was largely attended. Among those received on confession were a grandmother and her granddaughters.

Would Attract Children—A children's church for boys and girls of the neighborhood, irrespective of creed, has been inaugurated by Rev. Z. H. Copp of the Cohocksink church. The service will consist of a five-minute object lesson and twenty-five minutes of biblical moving pictures.

Personal Notes—Rev. David S. Tappan of Hainan, China, one of the three foreign missionaries supported by Tenth church, Dr. M. A. Brownson pastor, addressed the congregation of Tenth church on a recent Sunday.—Rev. James H. Dunham, former pastor of Mount Holly church and son of S. P. Dunham, a well known elder of Third church, Trenton, N. J., recently earned the degree of doctor of philosophy from the University of Pennsylvania.—Dr. W. V. Louderbough has just finished a thirty-year pastorate of the church of Salem, N. J.—Dr. William H. Johnson, professor of Greek and New Testament literature in Lincoln University, will give the second week in February a course of lectures on the Stone Foundation in Princeton Seminary. The theme will be "The Christian Faith in the Light of Modern Knowledge."

UNITED MINISTERS ACCOMPLISH MUCH

Church Going Campaign in Rochester Brings Large Results—Try to Check Evils of Celebrations on New Year's Eve.

ROCHESTER—So intense is the interest among the ministers of Rochester in certain general matters that denominational clerical meetings have been given up for the winter, except for one Monday each month, and union gatherings take their place.

No Money from Brewers—The first matter that brought the forces together was the now famous gift of the brewers' association to the Y. M. C. A. building fund. On this topic the last word has now been said. The outcome is that the international committee of the Y. M. C. A. has announced a new policy — not to solicit or accept money from liquor or similar interests.

Urge Church Going—On Home Church Sunday the city and surrounding towns pulled together. Thousands of blue buttons were issued and worn as declaring each wearer's intention to be found in his own home church the last Sunday in November. The newspapers gave much space and on Saturday large paid ads appeared in all city papers. Letters of invitation were mailed. Autos were commissioned to bring to church the aged and infirm. No legitimate effort to gather in the people was spared. The result was that the churches generally were crowded—"standing room only" in some—multitudes, especially of men, being found present who had not been in church possibly for years. People unable to come—firemen, policemen, prisoners, shut-ins, etc.—were remembered with letters. Largely as a result ministers are now planning a winter-long campaign of Christian cooperation, to climax in the every-member canvass and a systematic effort to reach all the unchurched.

To Lessen Evils of Carousals—Another matter just now focusing attention is a concerted attempt to control and lessen the evils of New Year's eve carousals at hotels and other public gathering places. These midnight revelries have come to be a community disgrace, and the ministers are determined to check the evil if possible.

SHOW GROWTH OF SPOKANE CHURCHES

Pictures and Reports Entertain at Dinner—Congregations Merge Into One—New Buildings Nearly Ready for Use.

SPOKANE—Dec. 11 the Presbyterian Union held its annual meeting in First church. Officers were elected for the ensuing year and plans for city extension work indorsed. Members of the union and their friends to the number of about 125 sat down to a banquet prepared by Chapter No. 1 of the ladies' aid society of First church. Rev. W. A. Couden, presbyterial Sunday school missionary, with his stereopticon presented the work of Presbyterianism in the city and the proposed extension work. As the picture of each of our ten churches was thrown on the canvas the pastor arose and gave a brief history of the church. Dr. J. H. Shields, pastor at large, gave the figures as to the strength of churches in this city, showing that Presbyterians lead all denominations in membership, organizations, money expended and money raised for church work and benevolences. Professor J. F. Saylor spoke for the committee at work to raise $100,000 to bring Whitworth College here from Tacoma. Plans are all laid for raising that sum in January.

Denominations Mix—Recently, as indicating the trend of things here, the Presbyterian church of Odessa, Wash., and the M. E. church united and formed a Congregational church.—At Bonner's Ferry, Idaho, the Presbyterian, M. E., Baptist and larger part of the Disciples of Christ associated themselves together for work and worship under one pastor and he a Congregationalist.

New Church Buildings—Emmanuel church, Rev. D. W. Ferry pastor, reports the new church building they are erecting almost ready for occupancy. This will give them seating for about 400.—Rev. L. L. Totten of Manito Park church reports their new building almost ready for dedication.

LABOR MEN REFUSE TO HEAR STELZLE

Speech Was in Y. M. C. A. Building Erected by Nonunion Labor—Detroit May Ask "Billy" Sunday for Meetings.

DETROIT—Rev. Charles Stelzle was in Detroit Dec. 14, preaching morning and evening at Woodward Avenue church and giving an address at the Y. M. C. A. in the afternoon. The labor unions were invited to the afternoon meeting, but they boycotted it on the ground that the Y. M. C. A. building was erected with nonunion labor.

Discuss Christian Science—Presbyterian ministers on a recent Monday morning discussed Christian Science in a symposium by Doctors Jaquess, Jack and Homrighaus in a frank effort to find out why it had been able to gain 80,000 adherents in a few years and whether it was not partly the fault of evangelical Christianity for neglecting some important aspects of truth.

May Get Sunday?—A committee of Detroit pastors, consisting of Dr. E. H. Pence, Presbyterian; M. F. Fikes, Baptist, and H. Lester Smith, Methodist, is in communication with Rev. William A. Sunday with a view to securing him for some union evangelistic meetings in Detroit at as early a date as possible. One great difficulty is that the ministers are not entirely unanimous in the invitation.

Raise Question of Possible Removal—A big packing house fire, uncomfortably close to Calvary church, has again raised the question of possible removal to a better location. Rev. David I. Sutherland, who has been pastor of this church for thirteen years with a constant growth in membership and aggressive work, has demonstrated that success is possible in any locality with a live pastor and people.

Draws Churches Together—A gathering of Presbyterian ministers and church officers at Jefferson Avenue church Dec. 8 did more to weld the various churches together for a united work than has anything that has occurred for many years. The addresses by Doctors McAfee and Nollen were fine, but it was the social Christianity at the gathering that counted for the biggest dividends.

Seventy per cent of Presbyterian churches are in rural and village communities.

WILL STUDY PORTLAND'S SOCIAL FORCES

Sunday School Class Undertakes Important Task—Pastors Plan Evangelistic Advance—Country Churches Help Community.

PORTLAND, ORE.—The "Current Events" class which was recently organized in First church Sunday school has an attendance of from 140 to 180. Plans are already laid by this organization for a comprehensive set of surveys which will embrace all the social forces operative in the civic life of Portland. When these surveys have been completed, for the first time there will be definite information upon at least some of the forces that are working for weal or woe. The wisest statesmanship of the church is being trained upon the problems which are more easily solved now than they will be when the expected influx of immigration after the completion of the Panama canal has taken place. The growth of the Sunday school of this church in the last two years is remarkable. Two years ago the attendance was 415; the first Sunday of December it was 902 and a vigorous effort is being made to lift it up to the thousand mark at once.

Plan Definite Evangelism—At the late meeting of presbytery a profitable conference was held concerning the work of evangelism. In an informal but very telling way the chairman of the committee on evangelistic work laid before the ministers and elders the importance and need of the work and then gave some hint of the plans which his committee intends to place in operation in the near future. Probably one of the things that will come to the pastors first is a day of prayer unlike the ordinary day set apart for this purpose. Instead of the entire presbytery meeting in one place ministers will be asked to get together by twos, generally those of adjacent fields, and spend some time in prayer. This will be followed by a day of retirement or retreat at Orenco church. January will be given over as largely as possible to work for the saving of souls carried on in accordance with the needs of each church.

Church Partly Completed—Piedmont church got into the Sunday school room of its new building the last Sunday of November and held a very profitable meeting. It is hoped that the building may be ready for dedication by Feb. 12, the ninth anniversary of the church. The building, in its present form, will cost $33,000. Later it is planned to add an additional $7,000 to the plant.—Rose City Park church is nearly completed. The rededication is set for Dec. 28.

Has Poultry Show—Two churches near by have developed the "country life" idea to a high degree of efficiency, Orenco and Springwater. The former church has taken a large place in the development of the community. A year ago a poultry show was organized and held in the basement of the church. A couple of weeks ago the second show was held, but it had outgrown its former quarters. Sidewalks radiate for a mile or two in all directions from the church. This easily makes it the social center. Rev. L. M. Boozer has entered upon a large and constructive work in this field. Springwater church is in the center of the prune and apple lands of Claskamas county. Here Rev. C. F. Aue has reached out for miles and laid hold of the people until the church holds first place in the social life of the entire community. The house of worship must soon be enlarged.

HOLD SUNDAY SCHOOL ON VACANT LOTS

Russian Children Can't Be Coaxed Into American Churches—Californians Hesitate on Prohibition Campaign Now.

SAN FRANCISCO—Rev. Joachim Glazko, the immigrant pastor at large of presbytery, is holding Sunday school in vacant city lots in different parts of the Potrero because he cannot coax the little Russians into American churches and there are no funds at his disposal for the shelter of his new gathered flocks. One group numbers from fifty to sixty children.

Add to Church Building—St. John's church, under the pastorate of Rev. Alexander Eakin, has so increased its Sunday school that a new addition to the church has been erected which will be occupied on the first Sunday in January

Will Change Its Name—Richmond church under Rev. C. S. Tanner has decided to change its name to Lincoln Park church, as the park in that vicinity is to be a part of the exposition grounds and will make a splendid identification mark for the future.

Calls It "Carnival of Profit"—Former Mayor J. Stitt Wilson of Berkeley has appealed to all the ministers of San Francisco to join with him and his socialist organization "in a social crusade to celebrate Christmastide in San Francisco and the bay cities in a new, unique and distinctive manner." His plea is against the present commercialization of Christmas and he calls it a "carnival of profit."

Promote Health; Oppose Liquor Fight—A joint committee of which Rev. W. K. Howe of Trinity church was a leading member has been promoting a "health lecture course" by W. Earl Flynn in the various churches of the city. Another joint committee of which Elder A. S. Johnson of Calvary is chairman and Rev. D. M. Gandier of Los Gatos a member, and including representatives from all the denominations in California, met Dec. 9 and formulated official protest against the present attempt to initiate a statewide campaign for prohibition in California in 1914.

To Extend Bible Work—Hugh Gilchrist, D. D., president of the San Francisco Bible College, of which he is the founder, has retired from the executive management of Mount Hermon, the Presbyterian Northfield for Californians, of which also he was the organizer. He will devote all his time to Bible College management and extension. Already the extension idea has caught the minds of church people and Dr. Gilchrist has begun the instruction of a class of 150 members of the First church of Oakland in the epistle to the Galatians. The class meets at the Oakland Y. M. C. A. once a week.

Has New Manse—Grace church under its pastor, Paul R. Dickie, has finished building the second manse in this presbytery.

CHICAGO WILL INVITE ALL TO CHURCH

Denominations Unite in Plan Under Suggestion of Christian Endeavor—Riverside Installs New Pastor with Appropriate Services.

CHICAGO—Feb. 1 has been set as the day upon which the churches of Chicago will unite in a great effort to get everyone in the city to attend the church of his choice. The Presbyterian ministers indorsed the movement Monday morning and appointed Rev. F. A. Hosmer to represent them at a meeting at the LaSalle hotel next Monday, when plans for arousing interest in the movement will be made. The idea originated with the Chicago C. E. Union, which has had a committee at work on the plan for some time. A general committee will be named at the meeting next Monday afternoon to manage the general plan, each church and denomination to follow its own methods of getting the people out.

Install New Riverside Pastor—Rev. Alfred F. Waldo, for ten years pastor of Central church, Chambersburg, Pa., was installed pastor of Riverside church Dec. 15. In the enforced absence of James G. K. McClure, formerly Mr. Waldo's pastor at Lake Forest, who was appointed to preach the sermon, this part was taken by Dr. Edgar P. Hill, who, twenty-five years ago, received but was compelled to decline a call to Riverside. Moderator F. L. Selden presided and propounded the constitutional questions. Rev. Samuel Dickey, a Princeton Seminary classmate of the pastor-elect, offered the prayer. Dr. Paul B. Jenkins, Milwaukee, a son of the retiring pastor and also a classmate of the pastor-elect, gave the charge to the pastor. Dr. H. D. Jenkins, who has served the church as pastor for thirteen years, delivered the charge to the congregation.

Chinese Celebrate Early—Last Sunday evening the Chinese Sunday school, meeting in Assembly hall, celebrated Christmas with a tree and special program. The school meets in the afternoon and evening, a lunch being served between the two sessions. The work is done in English, but is not progressing as fast as possible on account of lack of teachers. There are openings for twenty young men and women to teach in this school.

First Church Anniversary—Music will have a large part in the celebration of the eightieth anniversary of the founding of the first church in Chicago at First church Jan. 4. Special musical services at the same church were held Dec. 21 and there will also be a musical program Dec. 28.

Total Budget Is $85,000—In addition to the $2,500 monthly mentioned recently in The Continent as needed by the Church Extension Board, there are other large sums required. There is $2,500 needed for salaries of mission workers alone each month. The board last year also disbursed $28,000 on account of church erection, assisting weaker churches and improving facilities at mission points. Support of the Training School and Christian Industrial League is in addition.

Chicago Helps Kansas City—H. B. McAfee, president of the Chicago Training School, is in Kansas City assisting the local committee in plans for the convention of the student volunteers there next week. Mr. McAfee lived in Kansas City and vicinity thirty-eight years, was president of the church federation there and head of the men and religion committee of Kansas City.

Women Will Meet—Olivet church will entertain the presbyterial societies of home and foreign missions Jan. 8. Special conferences for local officers will be held in the morning.—The annual day of prayer by the interdenominational committee on missions of the central West will be held at Moody Institute in the women's building Jan 9, beginning at 10:30 a. m. Mrs. O. R. Williamson and Mrs. E. M. Bowman will preside during the day.

Brief Bits of News—Mrs. D. B. Wells will give a course of lectures in Woodlawn Park church Jan. 4 to 9 on mission subjects at 8 o'clock.—Rev. J. G. K. McClure, Jr., recently ordained by Chicago Presbytery, is pastor at Iron River, Mich., instead of Iron Mountain as was announced recently.—Ministers next Monday will help dedicate the addition to the work of the Christian Industrial League on the South side. This organization recently has been overcrowded with men anxious to work for their lodging. "We can care for scores and turn away hundreds," says Rev. G. A. Kilbey in speaking of present conditions.

SANTA CLAUS HAS MANY EAGER AIDS

New York Organizations Will Provide for Crowds of Poor Persons—Parish Houses to Be Built Soon in Gotham.

NEW YORK—Among the various organizations which try every year to alleviate the suffering of the poor at Christmas the Salvation Army stands perhaps foremost. This year as usual it is giving its Christmas dinner with an enormous Christmas tree for the children in the afternoon, while baskets have been given to hundreds of needy families. The Volunteers of America are also giving the usual Christmas cheer, though Ballington Booth, the commander, says their receipts at this season have fallen off on account of the recent money-raising campaign of the Young Men's and Young Women's Christian Associations. The American Seaman's Friend Society and the New York Home for Homeless Boys are looking particularly after the holiday happiness of friendless men and boys, while the New York flower mission has been busy receiving and distributing flowers and gifts for the tenement houses and among the sick and insane.

Will Build Parish Houses—At the meeting of the New York church extension committee Dec. 11 money was appropriated to erect three new parish houses. One of these will be attached to the John Hus Bohemian church in the American parish, where Rev. Norman Thomas is superintendent of the work. Rev. Vincent Pisek is pastor of the church. Another house is to be built in connection with Mount Washington church, where Dr. George S. Payson has been pastor for nearly forty years. This is in the Inwood section of the city, which is just beginning to be filled with apartment houses, and the necessity for more room and greater facilities is imperative. The appropriation for the Mount Washington church is conditioned upon the promise of special givers to the church to continue their gifts for at least three years. This is the only Protestant church in this part of the city. The third house is to be erected for Bethany church, Rev. J. G. Davey pastor. This church has doubled its membership and contributions since Mr. Davey took hold. All of these new buildings are rendered necessary because of the great increase in Sunday school scholars and young people. The committee also discussed removing St. James (colored) church from its present location in 51st street to a site in Harlem near 130th street. The congregation, under its pastor, Dr. William R. Lawton, has been conducting a Sunday school in 130th street and the attendance has increased until the school has overflowed the hall and made a church building essential.

Dr. Macdonald in Brooklyn—At the meeting of Brooklyn Presbyterian Union in First church last week, where Dr. L. Mason Clarke is pastor, Dr. J. A. Macdonald of Toronto was the guest of the evening and spoke on "The Church and the Social Order." This was the first time Dr. Macdonald had spoken in Brooklyn and because so many desired to hear him a general audience was admitted freely to the church. The meeting was presided over by the president of the union, Roy M. Hart.

Closes Sunday Moving Pictures—The ministers of Huntington, L. I., recently went to W. D. Eccleston, manager of a moving picture show in the town, and asked him to stop his Sunday performances. At first he refused, but last week issued a statement saying that he realized the vast majority of people in Huntington did not care for Sunday shows and as he did not wish to offend the religious sense of the community he would not thereafter run his show on the Sabbath. Mr. Eccleston took occasion in this statement to thank the ministers for their friendly spirit.

Canvassing Increases Church Attendance—The Church of the Good Shepherd has recently undertaken a significant method of aggressive advance in its own community. This church, to which Dr. Daniel Lorenz has ministered for twenty-five years, finds today its location on the upper West side one of the most difficult in the city. Vice and other degrading influences surround it on every hand, but Dr. Lorenz is in no sense surrendering to the difficulties. His last plan was to send out thirty-five of the mainstay people of his congregation to canvass the surrounding territory between 60th and 70th streets. Blocks occupied by Italians and negroes were eliminated, and the remaining blocks divided into sixty districts containing eight tenement houses each. Thirty-five people canvassed every one of these houses within ten days, visiting 5,000 families. Less than 10 per cent of these were found to be Protestant, but out of this small number the canvassers took the names of 400 families not attending service at any church in that part of the city. All of these were urgently invited to the Church of the Good Shepherd. In the five weeks since that time ninety children have been added to the Sunday school and there has been a 10 per cent increase of morning congregations and a 25 per cent increase of evening congregations.

Commission Sails for England—Dr. William H. Roberts of Philadelphia, Dr. Newman Smyth of New Haven and Dr. Peter Ainslee of Baltimore, Presbyterian, Congregational and Disciple respectively, will sail Dec. 30 for England to urge on the Nonconformist churches there the participation in the world conference on faith and order which the Episcopalian commission on that subject is working for.

BIBLE CONFERENCE AFTER MEETINGS

Pittsburg Man to Pay Expense of Series of Lectures—"Billy" Sunday Opens Services Next Sunday in Big Tabernacle.

PITTSBURG—Pittsburg is planning to follow the "Sunday meetings" with a great Bible conference. The question of holding a Bible conference so soon after a great evangelistic campaign was submitted to the Pittsburg evangelistic committee Dec. 16, and after considerable discussion it was voted unanimously to accept the offer of Dr. Dickie of Winona to stage his Bible conference from March 15 to 22, 1914. The program will include such men as Dr. Campbell Morgan of London, Dr. John Henry Jowett of New York and Dr. John McNeil of Toronto. One Pittsburg layman has underwritten the expense. Plans will be worked out by a local committee in conjunction with Dr. Dickie

Meetings Open Sunday—Some 2,500 personal workers have volunteered for the Pittsburg campaign which opens Dec. 28. The tabernacle is not only the largest ever erected for Mr. Sunday, but cost $16,000, or almost twice as much as any previous one. Mr. Sunday has decided to stay nine weeks instead of eight. The question of closing churches has been definitely decided. The city is divided into eight sections of about forty churches each. Each section will close one Sunday morning service and tickets will be distributed in those sections, assuring a seat until 10:45 o'clock, or until the tabernacle is full.

Have Community Tree—Pittsburg for the first time is to have a community Christmas tree and celebration. The tree will be erected on the Frick lot. Music will be furnished by a band of forty pieces, the Pittsburg male chorus and other leading choirs of the city.

Brief Items—Miss Lena Leonard of Cleveland and Dan Crawford of Africa gave a series of missionary addresses in Pittsburg churches during the week of Dec. 21. The Presbyterians of Tarentum are planning a special evangelistic campaign during the month of January and will open with a mass meeting in the leading theater of the town the first Sunday of the new year.

HEAR MANY MISSIONARY SPEAKERS

CLEVELAND — Following the visit of Dan Crawford to this city, other missionaries of note have delivered inspiring addresses. Rev. Charles A. Killie of Poatingfu, China, spoke one Sunday morning in Euclid Avenue church and in the evening at Calvary church. Rev. Charles E. Patton of Kochow, China, visited Windermere church, which contributes mainly to this foreign field. During the last five years funds contributed by this church have established eighteen chapels and now there has been undertaken the task of educating fourteen men in the theological seminary for the care of these fields. Rev. A. L. Wiley, head of the Ratnagiri, India, mission, spent a Sabbath with First church of Ashtabula.—Elder Solon L. Severance, who favored so many local churches with illustrated lectures after his extended journeys to foreign fields, has not been able to continue this labor of love since meeting with a serious accident in Egypt, but recently at the midweek service in his home church, Woodland Avenue, he gave a talk upon Japan.

Men Are Active—Local brotherhoods are entering upon vigorous winter work. Rev. William P. Thomas of Phillips Avenue church delivered a lecture at the annual meeting of Ashtabula First church brotherhood. The men of Westminster church are conducting a series of week night lectures, the last dealing with "Modern Ideas of Prevention of Cruelty." At Windermere church the men's organization has established a Bible class and the last monthly meeting was addressed by S. W. Tener, who has charge of the American Steel and Wire Company's welfare department.

Brief Items—Rev. John V. Axtell has been installed over Wickliffe church.—The clerk of session of the vacant Boulevard church is A. C. Eckert, 1220 East 84th street.—The addresses delivered last September at the service held in memory of the late Dr. Hiram C. Haydn have been issued in neat pamphlet form by Old Stone church.

THIRTY YEARS IN CHURCH HE STARTED

BALTIMORE—J. Wynne Jones, D. D., pastor of Abbot Memorial church, Highlandtown, recently celebrated his thirtieth anniversary as pastor of the church. Dr. Jones started Abbot Memorial church with twenty-seven members. It now has 700 members.

Governor Speaks—The Presbyterian Union of Maryland held its first dinner of the season at the Belvedere hotel Dec. 15. Governor Goldsborough delivered an address on "Prison Reform" and George Sherwood Eddy on "Awakening in the Orient."

Confer on Education—At the meeting of Baltimere Presbytery Dec. 9 a conference on religious education was held at the afternoon session. The three topics of discussion were Christian education in the Sunday school, in church schools and in state schools. In the evening a popular meeting was held at which J. Beveridge Lee, D. D., of Philadelphia spoke on "The Challenge of the Age to Christian Leadership" and R. P. Kerr, D. D., on "The Christian College, an Evangelistic and Missionary Force."

Will Finance Evangelistic Campaign—Presbytery has adopted the "Chester Plan" of evangelistic work. The evangelistic committee, Rev. F. S. Downs, pastor of Calvary church, chairman, and the laymen's evangelistic association, Bryson Millikin, elder in Brown Memorial church, president, are pushing an underwriting campaign for a fund of $3,000 to finance the work. About half the amount has already been subscribed.

WILL BUILD CHURCH SOON

CALIFORNIA—Calvary church, Long Beach, formed by a number of members of First church, will not apply for admission to Los Angeles Presbytery at the January meeting, according to Dr. E. C. Jacka. The church expects to begin the erection of a building before long and will soon have a congregation of four or five hundred members, there now being 300 members enrolled with an attendance at prayer meeting of 250. Dr. O. H. L. Mason is pastor.—A week of special services was recently held at Hayward by Dr. W. C. Sherman of Berkeley, assisted by other pastors.

CHURCHES RAISE BURDENSOME DEBTS

NEW JERSEY—Ocean City First church held a special celebration Dec. 18 when the $6,000 mortgage on the church property was burned. The church is now free of debt and in possession of a plant worth $30,000. The pastor is Rev. Charles H. Bohner. Forest Hills' campaign to raise money toward the payment of the debt on its new building has resulted in over $18,000 being received. This leaves an outstanding debt of only $17,000.

Plan State Work—The home mission and evangelistic committee of synod was entertained at luncheon in Newark Dec. 17, Elder T. J. Arnold of Paterson being the host. The purpose is to have a number of evangelistic conferences in different parts of the state, and form elders' associations, such as the one recently organized at Trenton.

Go to Church Sundays—At Trenton everybody will be urged to attend church on the first Sunday of the new year. Rahway, Westfield and probably Elizabeth will soon try this plan.

Brief Items—The Presbyterian Union of Newark met last week in First church, Dr. W. J. Dawson pastor. Hamilton Wright Mabie of New York spoke on "The Japanese at Home."—Newark and Trenton are other cities planning for municipal Christmas trees this year.— Dr. L. W. Allen, pastor of South Park church, Newark, was the principal speaker at the dinner of the New England Society of the Oranges on Forefathers' Day, Dec. 22.

WILL REACH EVERY CHURCH

ILLINOIS—The recently elected superintendent of benevolences, Dr. W. S. Marquis, has just completed a tour of the presbyteries in which he has met the presbyterial committees on benevolence and with their assistance has grouped the churches, putting each group in charge of a committee which will do all in its power to introduce the every-member canvass for all the boards and church finances. He has also taken part in conferences of the interdenominational every-member movement at Sterling, Princeton, Kewanee, Monmouth and Canton and will be one of the team which will conduct another series of conferences in the southern part of the state after the holidays.

Anna Academy Gets Big Gift—Anna Academy has received a gift of 674 acres of land in southern Illinois valued at over $30,000. It is good farm land underlaid with two veins of coal and therefore steadily increasing in value. Rev. J. R. E. Craighead of Carbondale and those who have been carrying the burdens of this academy are happy over this gift.

Hold Special Meetings—Very successful meetings are being held at Marion and Metropolis in Cairo Presbytery. The pastor, Rev. J. M. Beane, is conducting the meetings at Marion. The pastor at Metropolis, Rev. J. Duncan Harley, has the assistance of Rev. Hay Bell.

CHURCHES COOPERATE IN MEETINGS

NEW YORK—Three weeks of evangelistic services have recently been held by six churches of five denominations on "Arbor Hill," Albany. The pastors did the preaching and the last week union services were held in the Baptist church.—Albany Presbytery at a recent meeting decided that the minimum salary for pastors should be $800 for single churches and $1,000 for two churches. A manse must also be provided.—William C. Spicer, Jr., son of Rev. W. C. Spicer of Gloversville, was received as a candidate.

Men Are Busy—The Presbyterian Union of Troy met in Second church, C. Waldo Cherry, D. D., pastor, Dec. 8. A New England supper was served to ninety men. An address was made by Thomas E. Finegan, assistant commissioner of education of the state.—The brotherhood of Liberty Street church of Troy, Rev. James G. Carlile pastor, presented on the evening of Dec. 11, in the Y. M. C. A. hall, in song recital, Harry T. Burleigh, a colored singer.

Improve Church—Interior improvements have recently been completed in Floral Avenue church, Binghamton.

MANY AT COUNTRY CHURCH MEETINGS

IOWA—Excellent weather and good roads aided greatly in the attendance at the series of country life institutes recently held in Jones county. Dr. W. H. Wilson was unable to be present on account of an important meeting in California. His place was taken by Rev. M. B. McNutt, who was assisted by a number of experts in country life work.

Remembers the Colleges—The late Mrs. Lois G. Stuart of Audubon left $5,000 each to the Presbyterian church of her home town, to Dubuque German College and Seminary, to Buena Vista College, Coe College and Omaha Seminary. The church at Ames, mission boards and other objects likewise received substantial bequests.

FARM MORTGAGES yield a higher rate of interest than many other forms of investment.

When representing a first lien on property in a rich agricultural district there are no investments safer.

First mortgages on such property are the only kind we handle. Our books show a record of more than $3,500,000 loans placed on farms in South Dakota without a single dollar's loss to an investor.

Returns average 5½% and 6%. No waiting for interest or principal.

Brief Items—Adair has just completed a new manse for its pastor, Rev. Sampson Cocks, who has recently returned from England with a bride. —Glendale church, Council Bluffs, is building a manse for its pastor, Rev. C. H. Leeper.—Macedonia church as a result of a two weeks' meeting, in which the pastor, Rev. C. H. Leonard, was assisted by Rev. J. E. Cummings, added a number to the membership.

DISCUSS FINANCIAL PROBLEMS

OHIO—Church financial problems were discussed before a recent meeting of Lima Presbytery by Rev. A. F. McGarrah.

Various Items—Special meetings were recently held at Second church, Findlay, Rev. George W. Applegate, pastor, doing the preaching. This church is contemplating a change in its financial organization.—Mission study lectures on "Immigration" were given by Mrs. D. E. Wiber of Washington, D. C., during the month of November before the women of Lima presbytery. The presbyterial society has decided to have another course next year. These lectures were held at six churches located at different points in presbytery, four lectures being held at each of the six churches. More than 500 ladies were in attendance.—Dayton Presbytery at a recent meeting approved the rebuilding of Park church, Dayton, on its old site.

Dismisses Old Friends—Lima Presbytery recently dismissed two well known members when Rev. D. E. Jones, stated clerk, and Dr. James A. Gordon were released. Mr. Jones organized Venedocia church nineteen years ago and has been its only pastor. It has 120 members now. Dr. Gordon was pastor at Van Wert twenty-two years, resigning a year ago for travel. Mr. Jones goes to Cambria, Wis., and Dr. Gordon to Winona Lake, Ind.

Have New Building—A Sunday school building which will accommodate 500 pupils in separate departments is nearing completion in connection with First church, Cambridge. The membership of the church has recently increased largely and the support of a missionary in China has been assumed. An evangelistic campaign will begin Jan. 18. Rev. W. L. McCormick is pastor.

"BILLY" SUNDAY'S WORK PERSISTS

PENNSYLVANIA—Over 100 Bible classes containing at least 5,000 men are still meeting as a result of the services of Rev. W. A. Sunday at Wilkes-Barre last spring. Sixty members of one of the Bible classes recently had charge of services in eighteen Scranton churches at which there was a very large attendance.

Confer on Education—A conference on Christian education was held by Butler Presbytery recently with addresses by President Ormond of Grove City College and by Rev. W. H. Crothers. A report was also given on the life and services of Dr. I. C. Ketler, late president of Grove City College.

Financial Situation

Department Compelled to Be Accurate, Even When Times Are Not the Best—Banks Have Plenty of Money.

Financial conditions at the present time bring a pressure on a financial department such as this which is not usually felt in the same degree. The giving of pessimistic facts tends to breed pessimism, but the giving of optimistic facts which are not significant is ethically unfair to the readers. It is the aim of this department to tell facts about the financial condition of the country and to give information of interest to those who are members of the army of the thrifty, even though their savings are too small to be seriously affected by current financial conditions. It is usually true, however, that the same influences which affect the large concerns have finally an influence on even the man who has only a few hundred dollars safely invested.

No Real Reason for Stagnation—Conditions at the present time tend to conservatism. Large factories in some parts of the country are laying off men, large cities have a great many unemployed, and railways, large consumers, are not ordering much new material of any sort not imperatively needed. On the hopeful side there is the big fact that there is no apparent reason for slow times except an indefinite fear that something will happen. The banks in the main have plenty of money, the smaller banks in some parts of the country holding as high as 15 per cent or more above their usual cash reserves. Various mercantile lines have adjusted themselves to the present conditions and no trouble is expected, although some firms which owe large amounts of money and are unable to keep off creditors may be forced to the wall. The man with ready cash in times of this sort is the most independent. What effect the passage of the currency bill will have is still a mooted question. Just what is a "good" currency law brings differences, though the Owen-Glass measure is favorably regarded by many economists.

"Successful Investment" Letters—Next week's Continent will contain the prize-winning letters from readers concerning savings and investment. They are extremely interesting. If each reader of The Continent could see all of these letters he would get a vision of the possibilities of thrift and careful investment that would cause him to stay his hand when temptations to frivolous expenditure come his way. Not all of the good letters could be prize winners, but some that are not are so much worth while that the most helpful of the latter will be used or commented on from time to time in this column during the coming months. They are real stories of successful investments by men whose incomes have been small.

Big Salaries Reduced—It is reported from Akron, Ohio, that the officials of an automobile tire company there have voluntarily reduced their salaries one-third. One of the leading officials has been drawing $60,000 a year, so that the reduction, although notable, will not cause him to worry about the high price of butter.

BIBLE SCHOOL'S STUDENTS PRAISE IT

A unique affair at the Bible Teachers' Training School, New York City, recently was a dinner at which the hosts were three gentlemen who have been temporarily engaged in a postgraduate study at the school. These were Dr. Willis Parsons, late president of Parsons College; C. S. Keen, dean of the language school, Nanking, and G. G. Helde, secretary of the Y. M. C. A., El Paso, Texas. These gentlemen wished for themselves and other postgraduate students the opportunity of testifying to their appreciation for the efficiency and scholarship of the faculty which Dr. W. W. White, the founder and president of the school, has gathered together.

The guests were principally missionary secretaries and missionaries on furlough. Dr. Parsons presided. He warmly indorsed the system which assigns to every student some particular form of active Christian work in the city. Other students, including Mr. Keen and Mrs. Lingle of China, enlarged upon the cosmopolitan fellowship of the school.

Mr. Fowler, president of the Student Volunteer Movement in the institution, reported that thirty-five out of 105 undergraduate students are volunteers. Doctors Marquess, Sweet and Stout, and finally Dr. White himself, responded for the faculty. Dr. A. F. Schauffler, the president of the board of trustees, also spoke.

Dove in Place of Wine at Launching

Dr. Wilbur F. Crafts is leading a movement to substitute the dove of peace for the wine of strife in all future launchings of ships. At the recent campaign of missionary evangelism conducted by the Presbyterian church at Oklahoma City, Okla., Dr. Crafts moved a resolution which has passed urging the secretary of the navy to have set free a white dove instead of christening with wine at the launching of the Oklahoma.

MINISTERIAL OBITUARY

Rev. Henry C. Gillingham died in the Chester county, Pennsylvania, hospital, Dec. 17, after a lingering illness, in his 56th year. He was born at Lakaska, Pa., and was a special student for four years in Princeton Seminary. Between 1884 and 1891 he did mission work in Westfield, Wis., Logan, Iowa, Oakdale and Modesta, Cal. Since 1893 he had been engaged in newspaper work in the East. Five brothers survive him, one of whom is Rev. Oscar A. Gillingham, pastor at Darnestown, Md.

Dr. Isaac Van Wert Schenck, founder and for many years pastor of Grace church, Brooklyn, N. Y., died Dec. 15 in a Newark hospital. Dr. Schenck, who was 67 years old, was a direct descendant of Major Andre, the British spy in the revolutionary war. Dr. Schenck was born in White Plains, N. Y., where his father was a minister of the Dutch Reformed church. After graduating from Westminster College in Missouri, he graduated from Princeton Seminary. Within a few years he went to Brooklyn, where he built Grace church and where his chief lifework was done. When his health gave way he moved to Newark, N. J., becoming pastor of Christ Reformed church. But he was again obliged to give up his church on account of impaired health and finally entered the employ of the city at the city hospital, where he had charge of the supplies. Dr. Schenck is survived by his wife, a daughter, three brothers, a sister and his mother, Mrs. Annie Van Wert, who is living in Trenton at the age of 99. His sister, Miss Annie Schenck, was for twenty-five years a missionary in Teheran, Persia.

Offer Help for Vocation Day

Two pamphlets in connection with Vocation Day, Feb. 1, have been issued by the Board of Education of the church. One of them is a series of selected readings to accompany the Vocation Day exercises.

Mrs. Helen L. Mackay, widow of Dr. Donald Sage Mackay, formerly pastor of the Collegiate Reformed Church in New York City and for many years pastor of First church, St. Albans, Vt., died suddenly Dec. 11 in a hospital in New York.

> "The one periodical that serves the whole country, the whole church and the whole family, and everlastingly keeps up its standard of quality."

WE set the mark always higher. The quality of contributed articles, editorials, departments and news which has characterized The Continent and The Interior will be more than maintained during 1914. The index to articles published during the last six months found in the last pages of this issue is the best possible evidence of the continuous effort to present the work of the most capable writers on the subjects in which our readers are interested. Here are some of the writers whose work will appear:

CHURCH SERVICE

Thousands of our readers depend upon The Continent for assistance and suggestions in connection with their preparation for Sunday school, Young People's meeting and weekly devotional service of the church. Dr. J. L. Scott of Philadelphia and Dr. A. C. Zenos of Chicago will contribute comments on the Sunday school lessons during the coming months. Dr. E. A. Wicher of San Francisco will continue his much appreciated discussion of the topics for [illegible] midweek meeting and William T. Ellis each week [illegible] have helps for young people in their service. This department will contain also suggestions each week for making the meetings more interesting.

THE NEWS THAT'S WORTH WHILE

FROM THE MISSION FIELDS

The work of the representatives of the church at home who are at the forefront of Christian progress beyond the seas is kept constantly before the Church through the unique page of live missionary news and pictures. No other religious weekly presents mission news so promptly after occurrence.

CHILDREN AND THE HOME

In the "Home Council" and "Young America" pages The Continent maintains two departments which are of distinct interest and value to mothers and young people in the home. On these pages are stories and articles of distinct helpfulness by writers of recognized worth. The frequent contests for children, in which their writings are published in the Young America department, are of great interest to the little folks.

BOOKS

Practically all of the worth while books issued by the standard publishers of America are read by the staff of reviewers maintained by The Continent, and their opinions of the worth-whileness of the books are given to our readers weekly. Many of our subscribers depend absolutely on the comments by The Continent in determining which books they shall buy.

OPEN HEARTH

Subscribers have the privilege of speaking freely to the entire Continent family at any time. Many want to be heard, and all must be brief. This is one of the most interesting of the departments in The Continent.

CALENDAR AND RECORD

This department on one of the last pages of The Continent shows the recent changes of ministers, and records briefly a great deal of information. It is not only a constantly revised directory of Presbyterianism but a weekly report of the growth of congregations in all parts of the country. Many readers tell us this is a distinct service to the church.

The Continent is brought each week to your library table with all of its inspiring articles and editorials at a cost of less than 5 cents weekly. Many parents have testified to the value of the paper as a constant reminder to their children of the place of religion in their lives. No one factor that can be contributed from the outside will do so much to maintain the true spirit of the Christian home.
